Men's gym to compete in NCAAs

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Although there were many twists and turns throughout the year, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team made it all the way to the NCAAs.

After a long four-month season, the boys from Amherst reclaimed the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championship cup two weeks ago, automatically earning them a spot at the NCAA National Qualifier which is being held tonight in Iowa City, Iowa. The top twelve teams in the nation were invited to the event and the competition should be tough to say the least. The top six teams after tonight's event advance to the NCAA Team Finals tomorrow, and if they want a shot at finals, the Minutemen certainly have their work cut out for them. Going head-to-head with tough teams like the defending National Champions, the Michigan Wolverines, and moving on to finals as a team would be a great feat indeed.

But the Minutemen remain realistic about the week's competition and advancing to tomorrow's meet is not their primary goal.

"As a team, we're as well-prepared as we could be at this point," freshman Ben Jacobs said. We've trained really hard for the past two weeks, so I think we're more than ready. I'm sure that we'll go out and at least make a name for ourselves [nationally] and hopefully move up a seat or two [in the rankings]. That's a realistic goal for us. We're not expecting much more, but it would be great if we were to advance to finals."

Even though they're not expecting to advance to the second day of competition, the Minutemen plan on putting forth some great performances and hope to have some individuals advance to the event finals on Saturday. There are several members on this team that consistently come through in the clutch and bring in some big scores when they're needed the most, so an All-American or two for UMass would be no big surprise.

Senior Jeff LaVallee, the Olympic hopeful from Stafford Springs, Connecticut, ranks fourth in the nation in the all-around and if he goes 6 for 6 on Saturday, he could easily take the gold on every event. But let us not forget about the other members of this talented team. Freshman Justin Hammar, the great pommel horse worker from Minnesota, could rank among the top if he nails his set, and junior Bryan McNulty could raise a few eyebrows with his vault and floor routine. If he hits his high bar routine like he did at ECACs, junior Mike Alexander could post a mighty big score, and junior Andy Leis could bring in a high mark for his team as well with his quick swinging pommel horse routine.

The list of talent is too long to name, but no matter what the outcome of tonight's meet the Maroon and White remain optimistic and plan on going out and having a great meet.

"I think qualifying to our first ever national championship is a great first step for our program," Leis said. "Hopefully it's something we can build off of for years to come. I think there are a good number of individuals on our team that could qualify for finals. If we hit our routines, we could even have some All-Americans."

Aware of the competition that awaits them, the Minutemen are still ready to come out and play. Moving up in the rankings is their primary goal and if they hit tonight, there's no telling how far they can go.

Minutewomen thump UVM

Slaughter. Pure and simple.

It would be nice to utilize a softer adjective in describing the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's 17-2 victory over Vermont, but really, no other adjective applies. Sixteen consecutive unanswered goals sounds should provide ample evidence in coming to this conclusion.

The big story of the Minutewomen's season thus far has been their offense – or, to put it better, the lack thereof. That all changed yesterday, as not only did 13 different players take the time to put the ball in the net, but three of those goals came from Iada Emery, Kelli Kuntz, and Leslie Pollock who had never previously scored in their collegiate careers.

Also having two-goal days were Sara MacNabb, Rebecca Minaker, Christy Ambrose and Kara DePaula, whose unassisted spinning goal at 14:28 in the first half was probably the most spectacular offensive play in a game filled with spectacular offense. DePaula also had an assist to her credit, doing more than her fair share in gaining the Minutewomen (1-3) their first win of the season.

The much-touted UMass defense was no less on its game than the offense, even if they did have fewer chances to prove it, with the ball seemingly always located in the UVM zone. Starting goalie Jen Nardi was pulled at 11:59 in the first half with a comfortable 9-0 lead, replaced by Cyndi Doyle, a freshman seeing her first action ever as a Minutewoman. Doyle was solid for most of the game, making four saves and giving up only two goals in the final two minutes of play. Of course, the other defensive players only gave the Catamount offense chances to take the occasional, fought-after shot.

The defense, however, was often left simply standing in the back of the field and stretching and performing little hops to keep warm in the chill breeze as the offense rarely let the ball escape its clutches and leave the UVM zone. Other UMass players to score on the day were Denise Brey, Fay Naber, Melissa Miele, Noelle Gorski, Stephanie Pavlick, Lydia Robinson, and Katie Carey.

This dramatic fashion of winning is one new to the Minutewomen season, as their largest lead this season prior to this game was three (over Harvard). Their offense had not made itself felt at all this season, leaving the stellar defense high and dry and the team winless up until today's total domination.

Vermont struggled the entire game through. While goalie Rachel Kaplan did make some very hard saves, she was unable to keep up with the barrage of shots coming from the Minutewoman attack. The Catamounts' spirits were raised somewhat when Megan Rath broke the shutout bid with her goal at 1:31 in the second, but at best it was a moral victory for Rath and little else, as the game was already done long before that. UVM was simply outplayed by the Minutewomen at virtually every level.

UMass coach Phil Barnes was understandably ecstatic at his team's dramatic emerging from their scoring drought. "Fantastic" and "tremendous" were the words which spilled from his lips when asked how he felt about the day's performance. He was impressed with Doyle's play and the sheer amount of shots his team achieved, as well as expressing his belief that the Minutewomen could very well carry this momentum into today's game against UNH.

Ah yes, the UNH game. The twice-postponed meeting of these two lacrosse rivals has finally been set for today at 3:30 at Garber Field, where it shall be determined whether or not yesterday's scoring bonanza was actually an omen of things to come or simply a one-time fluke.

Huskies claw back; late innings woes continue

The inimitable Frank Zappa said it best when he soulfully belted, "Watch out for them husky dogs." If only the Massachusetts baseball team had heeded those simple words of wisdom.

Looking to score a win on the road and get back to two games over .500, the Minutemen traveled to Storrs, CT yesterday afternoon to face the University of Connecticut. Head coach Mike Stone and his squad were looking for redemption, after having their eight-game winning streak snapped at the hands of Hartford on Tuesday. The Huskies kept at the Minutemen's heels all day, however, and pulled away with the victory by scoring three crucial runs in the final inning, to send UMass home with a 6-5 loss.

The Minutemen continued their trend of striking first by jumping out to an early first inning lead. Senior Shaun Skeffington led off the game with a single to left, and advanced to second on a passed ball. Sophomore Mike Kulak stepped up to the plate and was sent to first on four balls. The left fielder then stole second, leaving runners at second and third and setting the stage for designated hitter Kevin O'Connell. The senior drove a single to left center, scoring two and giving UMass an early two-run cushion. Shortstop Aaron Senez closed out the scoring in the first by doubling to right, sending home O'Connell to make the score 3-0 in favor of the Minutemen.

The score remained the same until the fourth inning, when the Huskies finally found their way onto the scoreboard. Senior outfielder Clarke Caudill got the ball rolling for UConn with a single to left center. Following an error by right fielder Connell Clark that allowed a Connecticut run, senior Brian Packin grounded out to second and scored Caudill.

The decisive ninth inning arrived with the Minutemen holding onto a two-run lead. The trend of squandering leads in the late innings continued, as UMass saw their three-run advantage disappear as the game went into the homestretch.

UConn junior Brian Esposito was hit by UMass pitcher Nick Skirkanich to lead off the final inning. Junior Joe Kagerer lined a single to center field, advancing Esposito to second. Sophomore Mike Scott reached base on an error, allowing Esposito to score from second and pull the Huskies within a run. After Scott advanced

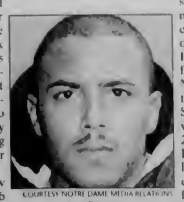
ND's Ferrer heads to UMass for senior year



By Brett Mauser

Known for its strong Irish contingent, Boston is just a two-hour cruise down the Mass Pike. Fortunately enough for the Massachusetts football team, it won't need to go any further than McGuirk Alumni Stadium this fall.

It was announced yesterday by UMass head coach Mark Whipple that former Notre Dame linebacker Joe Ferrer will make his way east for the 2000 season. The 6-foot-2, 233-pound Ferrer played three years at Notre Dame, leaving one year of eligibility remaining.

"Joe Ferrer will be a great addition not only to our defense, but to our entire program," said Whipple. "Not only does he have experience at the Division I-A level, he also brings us great character and confidence. We think he can supply for our defense what Jimmy Moore brought to our offense during the run to the national championship in 1998."

Ferrer specified his intentions to transfer in January and February, but never mentioned where. He chose UMass to mark one of the program's biggest impact transfers, the most recent being the aforementioned Moore, who shattered nearly every single-season receiving record in his lone year in the fold.

Joe Ferrer

Whipple's new arrival played 36 career games at Notre Dame with seven career starts, this after redshirting his freshman season in 1996. In lettering three years for head coach Bob Davie, Ferrer played significant time in the Irish's 5-7 season, totaling 27 tackles and a sack.

After a 3-3 start, Ferrer landed the starting outside linebacker position as Davie jockeyed with the starting eleven, beginning games with nickel and dime packages on the field. However, Ferrer took over as a full-time starter in Notre Dame's 25-24 triumph over Southern Cal, which was followed by a 28-24 win against Navy. However, the Irish's luck diminished, dropping their final four games and missing a Bowl game.

He will, in all likelihood, team up with co-captain Kole Ayi and Corey Potter at the linebacker spot, adding speed and agility to an already ultra-quick lineup. Unlike most transfers, Ferrer will not have to sit out a year, as NCAA rules state he can make a clean switch by dropping divisions.

"I was talking to coach [Brown] about him, and he's got good speed, and a high level of experience that is definitely going to help us a lot," Ayi said.

Ferrer, a Casselberry, FL, Native, battled with Rocky Boiman for the final linebacker spot, with Boiman winning out temporarily before outside linebackers coach Jerry Rosburg looked to improve by starting Ferrer. To UMass, he brings a tremendous amount of experience to a defensive unit that graduated six seniors from last year's 9-4 squad.

"Football's football. If you play it, it's always the same game," Ayi said. "Especially with our team, we've got really got good chemistry, so once he sees that, he'll have no problem fit-

Student coalition heads to D.C.
Group will protest against corporate interest

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

While the next two weeks will be busy for students planning a bus trip to Washington, D.C., it will be the three days they are there that might make history.

Busses leaving over three days will carry close to 500 members of the local community to Washington, D.C., for an international protest of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. The organizers are members of the Western Massachusetts Global Action Coalition, a group established specifically to plan for mid-April's protests.

"The coalition is made up of many different groups whose immediate goal ... is to raise awareness and build a movement to challenge unaccountable institutions that are setting policies, controlling peoples and our world resources," Tim Scott, a graduate student in Labor Studies, said. He said that he wouldn't describe his group as "special interest, but we want a say in how things and how policies are set, how society is run and who dominates it."

Tuck Young, a sophomore majoring in Social Thought and Political Economy and Women's Studies, said the coalition has "basic concerns with the power of a multinational corporation, the effects of the World Bank and the IMF, and the promotion of corporate interest over people, but we really have a spectrum of perspectives."

On-campus members of the WMGAC include the Radical Student Union, the Graduate Student Senate, the Graduate Employee Organization, Amnesty International, the Black Student Union, Students for a Free Tibet, Students Against Sweatshops, as well as organizations from the five-college area, unions, and individuals from surrounding cities.

The IMF and World Bank are both institutions that lend money to countries through a "structural adjustment program," which forces a change in the countries' economic structure, according to Young.

"The money has to go into very specific functions, creating exports, and further[ing] industrialization in the country," he continued. "They have to pay back these loans, and the money comes from the rest of the country's economic budget. They're paying back, and yet they need to keep taking money in, and these countries get further and further in debt," Young explained.

The trip's expenses are expected to be around $25,000-$30,000, including the cost of busses, housing, and other "miscellaneous needs," Young said.

"We've been fundraising for the last month. We're trying to cover costs for everything," Young said. "We're fundraising throughout the five colleges. UMass has been slower for funding, but we have $10,000-$15,000."

According to Scott, other colleges, as well as unions and other groups within the community, have also donated the money.

The trip is expected to cost between $25 and $35 per person, with alternate payment plans available.

"We have transportation for 500 people. There are people taking flights down [to Washington], there are students driving down themselves," Scott said, stating that there would be between 300 and 1,000 people from Western Massachusetts making the trip.

Through the protesting, the WMGAC hopes to raise awareness about the IMF and the World Bank.

"It's important that people realize that this isn't just special interest, this movement. It's about protecting the interest of all the citizens of the world," Scott said, adding that "these are unaccountable, undemocratic institutions that are running the economy, and pretty much setting the agenda for our lives."

"They're unjust institutions, and we want to bring people's attention to that," Young said. "Short term, it's really great to bring many people to Washington, get a lot of coverage, and shut down the meeting. We want to focus on the people who will stand up and fight against institutions we consider to be unjust," he said.

According to Scott, during last semester's protests in Seattle over the meeting of the World Trade Organization, "most Americans had no idea what the WTO was."

"Even if they didn't really quite understand why people were protesting it, they got [the idea], 'Okay, there's this entity called the WTO and a lot of people have a big problem with it.' So it's raising awareness and consciousness."

"Seattle, and now April 16th, they're just a couple events in an ongoing movement that's being built," Scott continued.

"Our concrete, short term goals are to go down there and shut it, down but in the process that's going to raise awareness to people around this country and the world as to what these institutions are, and why they are so insidious," he said.

Young emphasized the point that "this is not just about this protest, this is about building a movement, and this protest is a stepping stone to making that movement possible."

"This is not a U.S. movement," Young stated. "It's an international movement, and other countries around the world have been much faster to mobilize against it. The U.S. has actually been extremely slow on the uptake to get involved with these protests. Mainly because the United States benefits from these institutions," he said.

Scott said that it would be very interesting to see how the protest "played out."

"After Seattle, I think the government [was] pretty much embarrassed," he said. "There are massive preparations going on from the local Washington D.C. police to the different federal agencies on how are they going to contain this."

Scott said that the government officials are "very much aware that thousands of people are converging in their city for this conference."

"It's going to be interesting to see the steps they are going to take to contain it, and how they are going to try to keep the protesters away from this conference," he said.

Through civil disobedience and non-violent "direct action," the WMGAC hopes to shut down the meetings.

"The most effective thing about Seattle was that we weren't arrested. On the first day there were very few arrests. [The media] said that the violence didn't start until after the property damage was done, but I was on the lines and we were tear gassed before nine o'clock, and the property damage wasn't done until one in the afternoon," Young said.

"The most effective thing for them to do would be to arrest everyone right as we get to the protest and just ship us out of the state," he said about the Washington officials.

According to Scott, there are people planning to use a "fill the jails" policy, in which some protesters will purposefully get arrested with the intent of filling up the available cells for actual criminals.

The week before the protest will be filled with events such as puppet shows and street theatre.

"Everyone who is going down there as a part of the coalition has agreed to the fact that there is not going to be violence, there is not going to be property damage, they're not going to be under the influence of drugs or alcohol, and they're not going to be verbally abusive," Young said.

Scott added, "There may be individuals that don't follow that."

As for housing during the weekend of the protests, Young said there is plenty of housing.

"We have a church that has been set aside for our group coming down from Western Massachusetts with space for 200 to sleep on Saturday and Sunday. For those two days we have 200 places for people to sleep."

Scott added, "The housing will be free, and we're still planning and things are coming together. We've got a housing committee that's still trying to find whatever spaces are available. One of our members is getting around 50 spaces at Georgetown [University]. So we're still getting spaces, and we're trying to accommodate as many people as we can."

Young said the main focus was not just "to prepare people to go down in April."

"What we really want to do is educate the community and get the community involved with this, and with looking at how this affects them," he said.

100-year-old time capsule present from class of 1900

By Alicia Upano

SOUTH HADLEY - Last Saturday, Mount Holyoke College opened a 100-year-old time capsule, a gift from the women of 1900 to the women of today.

The capsule – wooden, dressed with a brass plaque, and no larger than a bread box – contained various class records, pictures, and souvenirs. The most well-known of the box's contents was a letter written by Margaret E. Ball to the Class of 2000.

Although the letter is included in the box, its fame precedes the time capsule opening ceremony, as it was published in the June 1900 edition of the College's student magazine. Ball, who graduated in 1900 and later went on to teach at the College, outlined the bond between the women of her time and the young women who will graduate next month.

Ball wrote, "We feel that our great antiquity should enable us to offer you impressive advice. But our minds are burdened by the weight of a hundred mysterious years, and we are haunted by premonitions that you will have learned in the kindergarten as much as we achieve in college."

In her letter, Ball foresaw a future of reform, scientific discoveries, and a time when women would have greater opportunities. She wrote, "You will be happy in looking backward to see the well-defined road between our day and yours, a road marked by the memorials of many labors and many successes."

The President of Mount Holyoke's current senior class, Sara Hines, said in a press release that it is amazing "that 100 years ago our foremothers were thinking about our class." The time capsule opening, she added, is a "celebration of the gift of history."

In this landmark year for Mount Holyoke College, the current graduating class has plans to preserve the capsule of 1900, and to create a capsule for the Class of 2100. They may create the time capsule for 2100 in the same box they received from the Class of 1900.

As the time capsule was featured in the Class of 1900's commencement exercises, Mount Holyoke seniors will follow the same tradition. The ceremony for time capsule 2100 will be held on May 20 during the College's commencement weekend. Seniors are providing input as to what should be included in the box.

The contents of the opened time capsule will be shared with the public and Mount Holyoke Alumnae in an exhibit at the Mount Holyoke College Library. The exhibit is slated to open before May.

TO THE CLASS OF TWO THOUSAND

This letter was in the 100-year-old time capsule that Mount Holyoke College opened on Friday, March 31. It was published in the June 1900 edition of The Mount Holyoke, a monthly student magazine.

We, the class of Nineteen Hundred at Mount Holyoke College, do hereby convey to our successors, the class of Two Thousand, greeting.

Believing that you will be a notable class, worthy of the distinction given by your name, we feel a bond of sympathy between us. We, too, have considered ourselves a somewhat notable class, while quite able to imagine that every name on our roll may be unknown to fame in your time; unless, indeed, some of our number shall be the grandmothers of some of yours. Possibly, it is because of doubt as to the lasting brilliancy of our fame that we leave you this bequest, though our words will have lost the force of freshness long before you can read them.

Much gaiety, much contentment, much strenuous study, are indicated in these memorials of our college life; and if the gaiety is withered and frail when you look for it, we trust you will realize that college women now have natures very like your own, though the same characteristics show themselves in different forms. For your amusement, we bequeath to you a picture of ourselves, begging you to believe that we are really much better looking than it will give you reason to suppose.

We feel that our great antiquity should enable us to offer you impressive advice. But our minds are burdened by the weight of a hundred mysterious years, and we are haunted by premonitions that you will have learned in the kindergarten as much as we achieve in college. We greatly respect our posterity, as is suitable for those to whom Darwin has taught evolution.

Of one thing we are sure, and it gives us reason for congratulating you on the advantages of your age. We believe that some of the many reforms seen by us only in the hazy future of the world, and longed for with the force of a somewhat impatient optimism, will be records of history to you. We believe that some of the scientific laws we are groping for with sadly baffled energy will, in your time, be matters of common knowledge. You will doubtless be working earnestly toward the solution of other problems, and groping misstily for the discovery of other laws; but you will be happy in looking backward to see the well-defined road between our day and yours, a road marked by the memorials of many labors and many successes. We believe, too, that we shall then be as far along as you, and perhaps not less awake to the glory of progress. Of that we can scarcely tell. But if your science shall have taught you

Bush unveils education proposal

By Joe Potente
Daily Cardinal (U. Wisconsin)

(U-WIRE) MILWAUKEE – Republican presidential candidate and Texas Gov. George W. Bush used Wisconsin as the setting to unveil his $2.9 billion, four-point education proposal entitled "Strong Teachers, Strong Schools" Thursday.

Bush, along with Gov. Tommy Thompson, spoke and was involved in an educational issues panel discussion at Fritsche Middle School in Milwaukee. Fritsche was the first district school in the Milwaukee Public School system to convert to a "charter" school, operating independently from the school district.

In the panel discussion, Bush advocated the charter method of schooling, an area in which Milwaukee is regarded as being a pioneer.

"Every child should learn," Bush said. "Educational excellence starts with [charter schools]. A mindset that says you can learn."

Bush's program includes spending $400 million yearly for new teacher training, increasing funding for the military "Troops for Teachers" program, allowing teachers to deduct up to $400 from their taxes yearly to cover classroom expenses, and establishing a "Teacher Protection Act" to protect teachers from lawsuits when enforcing "reasonable" classroom rules.

"I believe we're on the pinnacle of changing urban education for all of America," Bush said.

Bush also stressed his beliefs about the importance of giving more power to the individual states in education-related matters.

"The president should work to pass power out of Washington, D.C.," Bush said. "Tommy [Thompson] can address Wisconsin problems better than we can address state problems."

Members of the discussion panel included the Milwaukee Public School District superintendent, a Marquette University professor, the Pennsylvania secretary of education, the president of the Houston Federation of Teachers, and others. Radio host Charles Sykes of WTMJ in Milwaukee moderated the discussion.

Juanita Lee, a teacher at Fritsche who participated in the discussion, said she agreed with many of Bush's messages about the federal government opening up to teachers.

New ads focus on impact of Medicare cuts

By Deborah Barfield
Newsday

WASHINGTON – The black and white ad labels it a "nursing home crisis." And a nurse featured in the same newspaper ad complains that Medicare cuts make her job caring for the elderly much more difficult.

"Help me provide the quality nursing home care our seniors deserve," she says to her targeted readers, congressional lawmakers and the elderly.

The ad, which began running last week in newspapers and on cable television across the country, including New York, is part of a campaign by nursing home providers to get Congress to restore billions of dollars in Medicare funding. The ads, launched by the American Health Care Association and the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care groups representing skilled nursing home facilities, also are aimed at highlighting the impact of Medicare cuts on nursing home providers and making this a campaign issue.

As part of an effort to balance the federal budget, Congress in 1997 called for cutting $100 billion in spending for Medicare, the federal health insurance program for nearly 40 million elderly and disabled people.

Health care groups and even lawmakers complained, however, that when implemented the Medicare cuts went too far, forcing some providers to reduce services or file for bankruptcy. They said the cuts also devastated some teaching hospitals, particularly those in New York where many teaching hospitals are concentrated.

"Camp Elian" stronger than ever; supporters vow to win

By Sue Anne Pressley
Washington Post

MIAMI – The hunger striker for Elian was feeling woozy. For three days last week, Rita Oliva had consumed nothing but water and strong Cuban coffee, and as she collapsed against the barricades outside the boy's home, the 50 or so other stalwart protesters who seem to wait there around the clock gasped their concern.

Oliva, 30, nodded weakly as paramedics were summoned, slumping in her Elian T-shirt with the child's face on the front and a necklace made of a heart-shaped photograph of Elian and his mother, who drowned trying to bring him to the United States. But when Elian's great-uncle Lazaro Gonzalez emerged from the small white house and took Oliva's hand, calling her a "beautiful" person and inviting her in to meet the boy, she quickly revived. The others seemed to look on with envy.

That may be what they all wanted: a moment or so with the child whose fate has transfixed them for the better part of four months, and who now seems, in many minds, to possess powers that are almost spiritual. Through news lulls and fresh crises, they wait outside the Miami house where Elian lives, seeing themselves as the boy's celebrants, and his protectors.

Oliva, who came from New Jersey for the protest, is the exception; most live within a few blocks of the Gonzalez home in this hotbed of resistance against Fidel Castro known as Little Havana. Many are older, having fled their homeland and waited four bitter decades, in vain, for the toppling or death of the Communist leader. The younger crowd, born in the United States, knows only what relatives and friends have said about what it would mean for Elian to return to his father in Cuba – which both Castro and the Clinton administration insist must happen soon.

"I feel sorry for the little kid," said Juan Perez, 29, a security guard who lives five blocks from the home, and spent Friday night on the Gonzalezes' street instead of his pre-Elian habit of "hanging out" with friends.

"I know Cuba based on what the older people have told me," said Perez, whose late father left there in the early 1960s. "We are going to force them not to deport (Elian.) Because if he has to go back, he is going to face problems and situations that I can't imagine."

The supporters co-exist with the news media in a semi-permanent settlement that has come to be called "Camp Elian." It is a street filled with modest white and pastel-colored houses, the postage-stamp lawns surrounded by chain-link fences. The neighbors apparently are resigned to living in the middle of a media circus.

News tents have sprouted here like blue and white mushrooms, and the camera lights beat down on the crowd at night, illuminating the darkness with an other-worldly glow. During the recent unseasonably hot days, when temperatures hovered around 90, the crowd seemed to wilt visibly, but it did not disappear, growing to hundreds and even thousands when the boy's case reached an urgent point, as it did last week.

Federal immigration authorities warned they would begin steps to seize Elian if the Miami relatives did not agree to surrender him should they lose their latest court battle. Negotiations on this point will resume Monday. But a newly tense atmosphere has taken over Camp Elian.

On local television news broadcasts last week, several older women vowed to die rather than allow federal authorities to take the child. All week, the crowd practiced maneuvers, linking arms to form human chains.

"People see in Elian's plight their own tragedy," said Ramon Saul Sanchez, leader of Democracy Movement, one of the most vocal Cuban exile groups.

"They see the disintegration of the Cuban family, and the human drama of a small child having experienced losing his mom. And there is also another issue – they see a defenseless human being faced with the enormous powers of a world power like the United States, and a Cuban dictatorship intent on utilizing him as a political chip."

Sanchez said he and other exile leaders have been calling for nonviolence, whatever happens. "We say we are not willing to kill or harm anyone," he said, but added, "We are willing to die to defend Elian's civil rights."

During calmer times, the atmosphere here is part religious ceremony, part party. The protesters sing hymns and the Cuban national anthem; they wave Cuban and American flags. Their signs and banners riffle in the faint breeze: "Elian is Not a Trophy," "Clinton Coward, (Attorney General Janet) Reno Witch, Fidel Loco."

When Elian comes outside to play, as he did Friday evening cradling a new white rabbit, the crowd goes wild, cheering and chanting his name. Sometimes, the boy gives a little wave; other times, he falls into full rock-star mode, offering double "V" for victory signs as he rides atop the shoulders of a relative. "I want him to have this Bible and this crucifix," said Gustavo Trompeta, 67, speaking in Spanish. Trompeta, who has lived in Miami for more than 30 years, is camped out here regularly.

"I will be here until it is over and they let him stay," he said.

Alberto Delgado, 55, and his granddaughter, Jackie Abreu, 15, come as often as they can. Jackie said she believes Castro "will do something bad" to Elian if he returns to Cuba.

To her grandfather, living under the Castro regime remains a fresh memory; he emigrated on Sept. 18, 1980.

■ cuts

After intense lobbying last year, Congress voted to restore $17 billion of those cuts, including $2.7 billion for nursing homes and services. But some health care providers say that's not enough.

The American Health Care Association wants Congress to restore an additional $3 billion next fiscal year for nursing home costs. The association also wants the government to restore $2 billion to $3 billion in adjustments for labor costs at nursing homes.

Meanwhile, more than 1,600 skilled nursing home providers have filed for bankruptcy, and access to nursing care is "threatened," said Eric Hoffman, a spokesman for the association. "We feel that both Congress and the administration need to go back and fix the problem."

A recent General Accounting Office report, however, found that the bankruptcies of two large nursing home companies were caused by outside financial problems, and were not solely due to the Medicare cuts.

Health care groups say Congress, faced with budget surpluses, can afford to restore some Medicare funding and provide financial relief to providers.

But the plea to Congress might not be as successful this year. Republicans, who control Congress, can argue that the issue was visited last year and money was restored, said Richard Himelfarb, a political science professor at Hofstra University, who specializes in elderly and health care issues.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, has asked the GAO to conduct a study of the nursing home industry's finances, particularly as it receives $59 billion a year in federal funding. Grassley believes "that should be adequate to provide quality care," said his spokeswoman Jill Kozeny.

Meanwhile, Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y., who said the Medicare cuts were too severe, has vowed to continue the fight to restore more funding.

Microsoft case crashes; lengthy appeals begin

By James V. Grimaldi
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Talks to settle the Microsoft Corp. antitrust case collapsed Saturday, dashing hopes for a speedy resolution to the case and setting the stage for years of appeals.

In a statement dripping with frustration over four months of arduous negotiations, mediator Richard Posner said Saturday night that the differences between federal antitrust officials and Microsoft were "too deep-seated to be bridged."

"Unfortunately, the quest has proved fruitless," Posner said.

Posner's decision to declare an impasse sets the stage for U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson to issue a verdict in the case as early as this week. The government alleges that Microsoft abused its monopoly power in personal computer operating systems with its dominant Windows software.

Jackson issued a finding of fact in November agreeing with virtually all the government's assertions, and soon after appointed Posner, chief judge of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, to try to bring the sides together and avoid lengthy and costly litigation.

Leaving it in the hands of the court could mean one of several outcomes. After a verdict, which most observers believe will declare Microsoft guilty, the case could move into a potentially lengthy phase in which Jackson would consider potential remedies. Those could include breaking up Microsoft or forcing it to modify its business practices.

Joel I. Klein, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department antitrust division, said, "We will seek a remedy that prevents Microsoft from using its monopoly in the future to stifle competition, hamper innovation, and limit consumer choice."

Each side moved swiftly to blame the other for the collapse of the talks.

Sources close to the government case said Microsoft refused to close loopholes in its proposals and that its "final, final offer" was "wholly inadequate" to correct the damage done to the marketplace by Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct.

Added Klein, "Settlement for settlement's sake would be pointless."

In a statement, Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates said the government demands went too far, and that the Department of Justice and the 19 states that were plaintiffs in the case were so divided that "it became impossible to settle."

"We're disappointed that the government would not agree to a fair and reasonable settlement that would have resolved this case in the best interests of consumers and the industry," Gates said. "Microsoft offered significant concessions in the interest of ending this case. Unfortunately, the government was unwilling to accept a reasonable settlement."

Gates expressed frustration over having to deal with 20 plaintiffs that often seemed at odds with one another. "Between them," Gates said, "they appeared to be demanding either a breakup of our company, or other extreme concessions that go far beyond the issues raised in the lawsuit."

State officials rejected the notion that they sabotaged a deal.

New company combines knowledge to sell on Net

By John J. Goldman
Los Angeles Times

NEW YORK – Six prestigious international universities and cultural institutions will announce Monday that they have formed a company to sell knowledge and education on the Internet, a move that could be a model for courting lifelong learners.

The partnership among Columbia University, London School of Economics and Political Science, the British Library, Cambridge University Press, Smithsonian Institution, and New York Public Library will bring expertise and a vast amount of information to its Fathom Web site. Operations are set to begin later this year.

The site will seek to address one of the most serious weaknesses of the Internet, its founders say – the reliability of information on the Web.

All of Fathom's original content will be authenticated and its standards of editorial integrity monitored by the company's academic council, a panel of senior professors and curators from the participating institutions.

"It is our ambition to be identified as the place to go if you want to have authoritative information on topics across the board," said George Rupp, Columbia's president. "You have a whole range of useful information that would be calibrated by our best scholars."

Much of the information Fathom will provide has never been available outside the participating institutions.

Columbia University will contribute major selections from its oral-history project, one of the largest archives in the world.

Taped interviews range from a discussion with writer Dorothy Parker, to memoirs from Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, architect Frank Lloyd Wright and Arkansas Gov. Orval Faubus – who describes his conversations with President Eisenhower during the 1957 Little Rock, Ark., school desegregation crisis.

In a unique and moving memoir psychoanalyst Muriel Gardiner recollects seeing Nazi soldiers marching into Vienna in the 1930s.

The New York Public Library will give the site 54,000 photographs marking the historical, cultural, and architectural development of New York City.

Among offerings from the London School of Economics will be a lecture by Professor Danny Quah on the "weightless economy," the shift from a world of manufacturing to a world of weightless services.

The British Library will have multimedia presentations bringing to life treasured objects such as the Magna Carta and the Lindisfarne Gospels, priceless seventh-century illuminated manuscripts taken to London by Henry VIII. The Smithsonian's National Museum of Natural History will survey North America's endangered mammals.

Many of the seminars, lectures, databases, performances, and publications offered by Fathom will be free. But charges will occur as users move deeper into the content.

Clinton criticizes Congress as rising gas prices cause public alarm

By Jube Shiver Jr.
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON – Facing a mounting public outcry over rising gas prices, President Clinton lashed out at Congress on Saturday for failing to protect the nation's energy security.

Just days after lobbying the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to boost its oil output, Clinton criticized Congress for not renewing his authority to tap government oil reserves under the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act.

Congress has failed to take one of the most critical steps necessary to maintain America's energy security – an extension of the federal energy conservation law, Clinton said in a two-page letter sent to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. Clinton urged Hastert to seek House approval for a range of measures the president said was vital for a "sound, comprehensive energy strategy."

Hastert could not be reached Saturday and his press secretary declined comment.

Since the beginning of the year, several members of Congress have called on Clinton to release oil from the government's reserves to ease the financial strain on motorists at the gas pump as well as on homeowners who rely on oil to heat their homes.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., for instance, has proposed a bill to sell crude oil from the government's reserves that could be replaced by industry buyers when prices fell.

Clinton's authority to draw from the government's oil reserve expired Friday when the House failed to act on a measure to extend authorization an additional four years.

The release of government oil reserves might have cut gas prices as much as 10 percent at the pump but likely would have little impact now that OPEC nations have agreed to boost production, said Philip K. Verleger, an energy economist with the Cambridge, Mass.-based consulting company Battle Group.

Other experts, however, said the president should not interfere with the volatile oil market.

Using the strategic petroleum oil reserves for anything other than a dire national emergency is a mistake," said David Pursell, vice president of upstream research for Houston-based Simmons & Co. International.

Since it was established in 1975, after OPEC-sponsored production cuts sent U.S. gas prices surging in the mid-1970s, the government's strategic petroleum reserve has sparked controversy over what conditions must exist to trigger its use by the president.

Only once in the past quarter century has the reserve been used. Former President Bush's partial drawdown of oil reserves at the beginning of the Persian Gulf War in 1991 helped slash the price of a barrel of oil to $21 from about $31, in less than a week.

U.S. gas prices have risen more than 25 percent and now stand well above $1.50 a gallon. Clinton has not withdrawn oil from the government's stockpile, although White House officials said the president has not ruled out a drawdown if he regains the authority to do so.

Clinton's letter to Hastert also took Congress to task for failing to act on other energy proposals that the president said would better insulate the United States from overseas oil price increases.

Clinton said Congress should establish a regional home heating oil reserve in the Northeast, fully finance the $1.4 billion he has requested to promote energy efficiency and provide tax incentives for domestic oil producers.

All the ladies of 1900 would like to send a shout out, "AAACCCKKKK ."

Our Opinion

Biotech and the future

Biotechnology is a topic that has been in the news lately. Recently Boston hosted both the largest biotechnology conference in the country and more than 1500 protesters who are opposed to that kind of scientific research. The protesters claimed that biotechnology threatens religious values, human health, and the environment. In addition, protesters claimed that because tests have not been performed to ensure that genetically modified foods don't affect human health, they should be taken off supermarket shelves until they are known to be safe. Furthermore, some protesters claimed that genetically altered food comprises nearly three quarters of the processed food sold in the U.S., but the FDA and the biotechnology industry have not labeled these foods as such, and people don't know what they are eating.

Of course, those in the biotechnology industry who attended the conference claimed that the protesters had no idea what they were talking about. For example, the FDA does require labels on foods that have a change in nutritional value because of genetic engineering.

But biotechnology does not just alter the genetic composition of foods. It also provides the public with drugs that can help treat human ailments like ovarian cancer and influenza. The possibility exists that some of the protesters have actually benefited from biotechnology drugs, as one conference attendee pointed out.

Obviously, there are good points and bad points about biotechnology. What is clear is that biotechnology is a powerful tool that could radically alter the future of the planet. While good may come from this kind of technology, scientists involved with biotechnology research should be aware of two factors that can lead to trouble where biotechnology is concerned.

First of all, as many protesters pointed out, the biotechnology industry is geared towards making a profit. Anything with this goal is not generally geared towards the best interests of the people and the environment.

Secondly, many of the people involved in biotechnology today have lost an essential connection with nature that people in previous civilizations had. Humans have been genetic engineers since the development of agriculture 10,000 years ago when humans first started cultivating plants and breeding them together. But the difference between then and now is that people understood nature and its processes on an intimate level in a way that many people in the West today do not. These scientists miss the big picture of what they are doing and why, and they miss the fact that genetically engineered seeds have radically altered farming in the Third World, often to the detriment of the farmers and their families in those countries.

Thus students who are attending tomorrow's biotechnology job fair in the Campus Center should be aware of the benefits and the drawbacks of the biotechnology industry. In addition, students should consider the power that the industry potentially has, and how it will impact both humans and the environment. UMass students who aspire to jobs in the field of biotechnology should consider the bigger picture.

The Collegian hopes that Life Sciences majors will attend the fair, and will use the scientific knowledge gained at UMass to determine if these companies are really doing the best job that they can to serve the interests of the public. Socially aware scientists have always been needed, but they will be even more necessary in the 21st century because biotechnology is here to stay. It offers humans tremendous power, and the Collegian hopes that UMass students, who will be leaders in this field in the future, will develop social awareness during their time here at UMass that can be applied for the benefit of us all.

"Latin Explosion" denies the past

Dulcinea Lara

(U-WIRE) EAST LANSING, Mich. – My history doesn't begin with Jennifer Lopez's acting debut or Ricky Martin's emergence into the music world, although it seems that way lately. The popular idea of the "Latin Explosion" creates a historical vacuum for people under the umbrella of this label. The idea that these singers and actors exploded onto the scene, considered in some circles as the "Brown Invasion," leads to a problematic misinterpretation of the real lives of these so-called Latinos.

Because Chicano and Latino teachers, parents, doctors, and others holding honorable positions in society are completely neglected in this explosion phenomena, their history is trivialized and marginalized by people only recently taking notice of them. The theory of the Latin Explosion assumes these people were never here before. It assumes these people were not teaching, healing, working, and contributing to society before. It's like these people landed in this country yesterday and started giving salsa and meringue dance lessons. It even sounds ludicrous. According to mass media, we're now suddenly important to the political and consumer world because, not only do we vote in blocs, we also buy beer in blocs.

Most people know nothing about the true history, about the explosions that took place during the Chicano Movement and the early 20th century revolutions. Few people know about the women and men who contributed immensely to the world Chicanos live in today. As kids, most of us read a small paragraph on Cesar Chavez and the farm workers movement in the chapter on diversity in social studies. That's it.

If you wanted to know the truth about Chicanos and Latinos, that option wasn't offered in most schools or history books, even in my New Mexico school. If you don't want to know the truth and beauty of Chicano-Latino culture and history, at least refrain from believing that we're all about singing and dancing. Although this is part of our culture, it's a very small part.

As a journalism major specializing in Chicano studies, seeing Salma Hayek pasted on the glossy cover of George magazine straddling a big, red firecracker while smiling and exposing all the right parts, makes me think my studies are in vain. People see these images, which are largely perpetuated by popular media, and assume we're all like that.

We all love the Taco Bell Chihuahua, speak with heavy accents – emphasized by Hollywood blockbusters – and are devout Catholics. This simply isn't true. While these stereotypes may seem harmless on the surface, they are just as pernicious as the gangster and Latina sex-pot stereotype. These new stereotypes make us an "ahistorical" people, living only in popular culture, token ads. They assume we were never here before, and wipe our struggle from existence. Unfortunately, it took a population growth spurt for us to be recognized.

Mainstream movies like "Mi Vida Loca" and "Fools Rush In" portray Chicanos in stereotypical and romanticized roles: the strong family, the loose morals, the gangster, the oversexed woman, and on and on. What's worse is the new children's cartoon, "El Dorado." It is especially dangerous as a glorified depiction of the European colonization of the Americas during the 16th and 17th centuries. El Dorado means "The Golden One," in reference to the large amounts of gold that attracted conquerors from around the world. This cartoon praises what amounts to one of the most disgusting mass genocides in history. After the search for gold was over, millions of Native American men and women were killed and raped, literature was destroyed, and whole societies lay in ruins.

My guess, having not seen the cartoon, is this ugly side isn't portrayed. What an appropriate thing to teach our children – that monetary gain is more valuable than people's lives. I had a discussion with an acquaintance who questioned the harmfulness of such a cartoon. She asked why it was so dangerous. "It's just a cartoon after all. It's for kids."

Exactly. Put a false portrayal of history in a neat, colorful package with animated characters, and call it acceptable for children. This is even more irresponsible than the institutionally accepted mis-education our children are already exposed to from elementary to high school. This amounts to lying directly to our children. Imagine if Disney came out with a cartoon portraying a romanticized version of the World War II Holocaust, exalting the Nazi German view. It wouldn't fly, right? But it's okay to do this to Chicanos.

I've been thinking, it's funny I'm associated in this mixture of people. I'm not Latin and I'm not exploding. Explain this one to me.

Take some time and say hello

Wes Wrightson

Okay folks, here it goes. I have been living in the dorms for four years and have been eating at Hampshire Dining Hall everyday. Needless to say, I have come to know and respect the people who swipe my card and serve me food. I have also come to respect the people who keep the residence halls clean on this campus.

First off, there is Candy, whom I see every morning. She always puts a smile on my face. Candy, Rosie, Rosey, and Doris all go out of their way to get to know my familiar face because I have been eating there for so long. They know about my swimming career here at school, they ask about my time abroad in South Africa, and they inquire about how I'm doing in school and what I want to do after I'm done here at the ol' Zoo.

For all of the crap that people give the DCs here on campus, I can honestly say that I have never put them down. I'm not crazy about the quality of the food, but complaining gets me nowhere really fast, and the reason that I like Hampshire Dining Hall is that I seriously respect the people who work there. To think that at a school with so many on-campus residents (and in such a densely populated area as Southwest), the people who work hard to see that you get your daily dose of caffeine and fat actually want to get to know you is at times incomprehensible.

I think a lot of times people take it for granted that the men and women who serve us food every day dislike what they were doing for a living, when in all actuality that couldn't be further from the truth. The ladies like Candy, Doris, Rosie and Rosey, and all the rest of the staff really like what they do. They work hard to make sure that we have a good start to a day of skipping our classes, or making that damn hard decision to actually go to them.

Everyone has a story, and the fact that we as students don't at least take time out of our daily grind (as they do with theirs) to introduce ourselves and just say hello is kind of cold-hearted. I guess I could have chosen to go to other areas on campus for meals, but I really like the service and the atmosphere at Hampshire. Call me weird, or color me crazy, but I also respect and enjoy talking to the kind lady who cleans our dorm, Nana. She's the one who has to clean our trash, beer cans, and throw-up after a nice weekend of debauchery. She is the one who has to repair the damage certain assholes do our living quarters. When I see Nana in the morning she lets me know what the weather is like outside; I'm such a moron that sometimes I have to go back into my room to put on proper shoes because sometimes it looks warm when it really isn't. Nana and I also chat about other stuff as well. She almost quit a couple of weeks ago because the damage caused by some people in my dorm was too great, and the place was always trashed after the weekends. She works really hard, and while her job isn't exactly the most glamorous, she does it well and goes out of her way to make sure our lives are that much better. During finals week, she baked us cool stuff to eat, which goes above and beyond her job requirements.

Everyone has a story, and the fact that we as students don't at least take time out of our daily grind (as they do with theirs) to introduce ourselves and just say hello is kind of cold-hearted.

The thing that the ladies in Hampshire Dining Hall (and Nana who cleans up after us in our dorm) have in common is the fact that they all go out of their way to make our lives better in some infinitesimal way. I guess it's like service with a smile. After almost four years eating at the DC, I can say that they work really hard and really long hours. I think that the very least we can do is say a simple hello – it just might make their day as well.

Some of the workers here on campus might not enjoy their jobs, which might not be high-paying or easy or prestigious. But they come in and put in an honest day's work. They are the people who repair the stuff that we damage when we get out of control. A simple "Hey, how ya doing?" or "Have a good one" can go a long way; a smile back is also worth just the same.

I may not be a nice guy who is easy to get along with all the time, but when I take time out of my schedule (regardless of how crappy my day is) to say hello to someone and strike up a conversation, it's usually pretty genuine.

What are they thinking?

All hail the God that is John Rocker! Right, Atlanta? Was anyone else as disturbed as I was to see the standing ovation that the racist pitcher received at a Braves game this weekend? Personally I find that scary.

Now, maybe I'm a hypocrite for defending this side of the argument. Based on the fact that I am an employee of a newspaper and a newspaper thrives on freedom of speech. Not to mention the thing that the Collegian released last Friday, which was simply a wealth of First Amendment rights. I'm not even going to tell you what article(s) I was responsible for. However, I did enjoy the one that was written about me being the "number one guy I'd like to sleep with." How's that for a confidence booster?

Ryan Benharris

The man is a big, overgrown, bigoted baby who was raised on traditions of racism, sexism, homophobia, and anti-Semitism.

But back to the situation that surrounds Rocker. In my opinion it's a bit sketchy. On one side people are screaming that First Amendment rights are essential and that Rocker shouldn't be punished. On the other hand, people are offended. In my opinion, the punishment wasn't strong enough. The fact that he was greeted with a standing ovation was unacceptable.

First of all, I don't entirely blame Rocker for his remarks. I know first hand that newspaper people can be scum. The entire situation was based on the fact that the man is blatantly a racist, but the story was blown out of proportion by a media giant known as Sports Illustrated. The magazine was bored last January because there was simply nothing important going on. Football was winding down, NBA basketball had been struggling, and hockey has never been a big television ratings monster. Sports Illustrated and ESPN were simply bored. They needed something to juice the hype, and what's better than John Rocker?

So Sports Illustrated decided to go to Rocker and ask him a few questions. In case you didn't know, SI (and later ESPN) knew exactly how Rocker would respond. The man is a big, overgrown, bigoted baby who was raised on traditions of racism, sexism, homophobia, and anti-Semitism. He's the perfect candidate to sell magazines.

This being said, I certainly do not dismiss Rocker for his comments. The Major League Baseball administration did not either when they suspended him for long period of time, only to reduce the suspension later. The fans came down hard on MLB because they felt that his freedom of speech rights was being infringed on. I'm all for freedom of speech, but when did we give celebrities freedom to be jerks? Rocker is nothing more than another high-priced airhead, who looks like an ass every time he opens his mouth. This past weekend, at Olympic Stadium, he was revered for it.

I can't believe that people can be so blind. I'm all for cheering on my favorite team, but there must be uncrossable lines. For example, I'm a huge Pearl Jam fan, but if Eddie Vedder decided to turn racist tomorrow, I wouldn't be at a show giving him a standing ovation and my utmost support for being an idiot. Open your eyes, Braves fans. I guess I'll never understand the ways of other cultures. Besides, I'm sure that people in Atlanta will look at me funny when I'm roaming through the streets of Boston in my underwear yelling "Yankees Suck" after Nomar and the boys sweep the World Series over the Braves next October.

Students and activists from around the globe will join together at Hampshire College from April 7-9 for the 14th annual conference for student and community activists, The Fight for Abortion Rights and Reproductive Freedom. Both the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program, and the Population and Development Program at Hampshire College will sponsor the conference.

Marlene Fried, Director of the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program at Hampshire College, is actively involved in the planning and promotion of the event.

"I love it, even though it is exhausting. It is all very inspiring and exciting," said Fried.

The goal of the conference is to help broaden the narrow definition of reproductive rights. According to Fried, abortion is not the only reproductive freedom. The aim of the conference is to illustrate how reproductive rights are intertwined with other struggles for social justice.

The conference is a three-day event. Each day of the conference focuses on a distinct aspect of reproductive freedom. There will be several different workshops and speeches focusing on a variety of topics related to reproductive freedom. The workshops offered will discuss topics ranging from welfare rights to environmental justice.

"There is a common thread, a connection between the topics. What you will always see is a set of fundamental human rights," said Fried.

The conference begins on Friday, April 7 at 3 p.m. at Franklin Patterson Hall at Hampshire College. The highlight of the conference on Friday is an abortion speak-out scheduled for 7:30 p.m. The speak-out offers participants the unique opportunity to share their own personal experiences with abortion, both legal and illegal.

"This is a different kind of event from the entire conference. It focuses on the experience of women who have had abortions. It is a setting in which it is okay to talk about it, and it isn't the same experience for everyone," said Fried.

The schedule on Saturday, April 8, offers a number of workshops and speeches. According to Fried there is a good mixture of topics. Most importantly participants can hear about issues from activists and experts. From this perspective, not only can an audience become informed about an existing social dilemma, but they can also learn about appropriate actions to take in order to fight against the problem.

The conference is bringing speakers from around the globe together. Khosi Naba of the Women's Health Project in South Africa, and Thais Corral of REDH (Network for Human Development in Brazil), will be speaking at the conference. The inclusion of women from across the globe brings another dimension to the conference. Participants can begin to gain an international perspective on reproductive rights.

"Suddenly you feel like you are part of a movement," explained Fried.

The conference concludes on Sunday, April 9, with a speech focusing on eugenics and population control. This particular speech focuses on the influence that the biotechnology industry now has on reproductive freedoms.

The first conference for Student and Community Activists was held in 1987. According to Fried, the enthusiasm and interest in the conference has increased over the past decade. Fried attributes the rise in interest to the fact that women now see abortion as a right that can be lost.

"We want to make the issue alive for college students," says Fried.

This year a number of college students have volunteered their time, in a variety of ways, to aid in the success of the conference. The work of the volunteers allows Hampshire College to keep the conference free.

To register for the conference you may call (413) 559-5645 or e-mail clpp@hampshire.edu. The conference is free and open to the public.

A conference for activists will be held at Hampshire College April 7-9

Teleconference broadcasted at UMass

Local women's issues now take on a national perspective

By Meghann Boyle

The focus of women's issues at the University of Massachusetts—

Amherst has now expanded in a new direction. Last week, UMass participated in a three-day national teleconference. Involvement in this teleconference puts women's issues at UMass into a national perspective.

"We [UMass] as an institution have been discussing women's issues for many years, but haven't been participating on a national level," said Nancy Patterson, Graduate Program Coordinator for the Women Studies Department.

The teleconference, "Women's Lives, Women's Voices, Women's Solutions: Shaping a National Agenda for Women in Higher Education," was hosted by the University of Minnesota and was broadcasted to universities nationwide last week.

"In looking towards the 21st century, women faculty, staff, and students across the nation must take stock collectively of our progress address the critical issues that affect us, examine our roles as leaders and colleagues, and shape a national agenda for women in higher education that both embraces the diversity among women and moves us to full equality," organizers at the University of Minnesota said.

The Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women brought the conference to UMass. According to Patteson, UMass has been fairly progressive on the subject of women's issues. The University and the Faculty Senate have endorsed Vision 2000, a proposal by the New England Land Grant that is a call to action for New England universities to examine issues for women. UMass has also worked within the parameters of Title XI. Although UMass is working towards equality for women, there are still important issues relating to higher education that need to be discussed, which is why UMass participated in the teleconference.

The three-day teleconference started Monday, March 27 at 1 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center. The audience watched a broadcast by keynote speaker Johnetta Cole, Presidential Distinguished Professor of Anthropology, Women's Studies, and African American Studies at Emory University. At that point a panel including UMass deans discussed the impact of Cole's speech on the University community.

The conference continued on Tuesday, March 28. The caucus topics included leadership, partnership and outreach, teaching, learning and research, public policy and law, including Title XI, and work environment concerns, including sexual harassment. Universities around the country will then send the results of these caucus discussions back to the University of Minnesota.

The conference concluded on Wednesday, March 29, with another broadcast from Minnesota. This broadcast was a panel discussion, "Women's Solutions: Setting a National Agenda for the 21st Century."

~Calendar of local events for April~

Monday, April 3rd at 4 p.m.
Ellen Miller-Mack, Nurse Practitioner and HIV Coordinator of the Brightwood Health Center in Springfield, will deliver the seminar, "Poverty, Racism, and the Prison Industrial Complex," in Memorial Hall Lounge at the University of Massachusetts – Amherst. The seminar is sponsored by the Center for Research and Education in Women's Health.

Monday, April 3rd at 4:30 p.m.
Silva Kamien, psychologist and specialist in Gender Studies from the University of Buenos Aires in Argentina, will give a work-in-progress talk entitled "Gender and Power: Argentinean Women in Politics," in the Dickinson Living Room at Mount Holyoke College. Kamien will address issues related to public and private sectors, the place of women's groups in contemporary Argentinean society, rivalry, the wish for power, and resistance. Funded by the Five College Latin American Council and Mount Holyoke's Latin American Studies Program.

Tuesday, April 4th at 7:30 p.m.
Laura Reanda, formerly a political officer in the United Nations Secretariat and a 1999 Research Associate at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center, will comment on and present an edited version of a video entitled, "A World Free of Violence Against Women," in the Dickinson Living Room at Mount Holyoke College. Stemming from a conference at the United Nations on International Women's Day 1999, the video shows how women are successfully using the United Nations framework to fight against the worldwide epidemic of violence against them. Students are particularly encouraged to come to this event.

Thursday, April 5th at noon
In the fourth of its noontime series to be held at the Jones Library in Amherst, the League of Women Voters of Amherst will discuss a topic of longtime interest to many: voting rights for Washington, D.C. League members Liz Chilton and Gigi Green will present background information. The public is invited to attend, and those attending are encouraged to bring a bag lunch. Beverages will be provided. Further information can be obtained from League president Caroline Olson at 549-0133.

April 7-9, at Hampshire College
The 14th Annual Conference for Student and Community Activists, "The Fight for Abortion Rights and Reproductive Freedom," will be held in the Franklin-Patterson Hall. The conference includes a speak-out, several workshops, and numerous speakers. For more details call (413) 559-5645 or e-mail clpp@hampshire.edu.

Monday, April 10th at 4:30 p.m.
Jessica Nelson, from the Amherst Shelter for Adolescents and a Community Associate of the Five College Women's Studies Research Center, will give a work-in-progress talk, entitled, "Adolescent Girls and Power." Among the questions Nelson will address are: How do adolescent girls who have trauma come to feel powerful? What effect do experiences of powerlessness have on choices they make? Through conversations with teenage girls involved with the Department of Social Services, Nelson examines how adolescent girls move toward gaining a sense of their own effectiveness despite obstacles. The talk will be held in the Dickinson House Living Room at Mount Holyoke College.

Monday, April 24th at 4:30 p.m.
M. Idali Torres, an associate professor of Community Health Studies in the School of Public Health here at UMass will give a work-in-progress talk entitled, "Strategies for Sexual Health Protection among Puerto Rican Women." The talk will be held in the Dickinson House Living Room at Mount Holyoke College.

Ellen Miller-Mack, nurse practitioner and HIV Coordinator of Brightwood Health Center in Springfield, will deliver a seminar entitled "Poverty, Racism, and the Prison Industrial Complex," today at UMass.

The seminar will focus on how the judicial system discriminates against people based on their gender, skin color, and socio-economic status. Miller-Mack will examine how the prison system treats women and how it is shaped by poverty. The seminar is part of the Spring Seminar Series 2000, sponsored by the Center for Research and Education in Women's Health.

"One of the major ethical issues for women's health today is the problem of disparities in health and health care due to race, culture, and class. The impact of socio-cultural disparities on the health and well-being of women is particularly evident among those who are incarcerated," said Anne Stoddard, director of the Center for Research and Education in Women's Health.

According to Cheryl Baulding, of the Center for Research and Education in Women's Health, Miller-Mack will discuss the rights and limitations that are taken for granted outside of prison. Such rights include reproductive health care, control over the upbringing of one's own children, and the opportunity to seek help for drug and alcohol addictions. Miller-Mack will also explore why the poorest people are imprisoned and what race has to do with it.

"The poor can not afford lawyers, and there aren't places for pregnant women to go to get off drugs. Women are seen as accomplices to crimes and are given harsher sentences when they are pregnant because they are endangering the life of the fetus," said Baulding.

The topics to be discussed at the seminar touch upon ethical issues, as well as general community concerns. Fidelity fulfills expectations and more

High Fidelity
Directed by Stephen Frears with John Cusack, Iben Hjejle playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

This movie truly surprised me. The trailers and commercials made it look like little more than another insubstantial romantic comedy big on kooky hijinks and low on thoughtfulness. What I found, however, was a sincere, mature treatment of relationships and romantic fulfillment supplemented by carefully measured doses of humor and inanity.

John Cusack stars as Rob Gordon, a college dropout and former DJ who now makes a meager living as the owner of a used record store. As the movie opens, his girlfriend, Laura (Iben Hjejle), is moving out after their most recent fight. The movie, thankfully, doesn't jump right into Rob's efforts to win her back – in fact, we're never certain who, if anyone, he'll end up with. Unlike most movies of the genre, High Fidelity avoids the feeling of being scripted and predestined.

Much of the movie is told through Rob's first-person narratives and monologues, marking one of the few times I've seen the talk-to-the-camera approach used successfully. This success, in turn, can be credited to John Cusack's charisma and talent as an actor; anyone who's seen one of his movies knows the charm and sincerity he can bring to a part, and High Fidelity is a shining example of this. Incidentally, Cusack also co-wrote and co-produced the movie. Rob's narration also helps to keep the audience's attention on Rob himself, and not on his relationship with Laura, forcing us to see the world through his eyes.

While pining over Laura, Rob enters into a mid-life crisis of sorts, examining his past relationships and attempting to discern the reason behind his general lack of romantic success and stability. The movie is only linear in the sense of Rob's progressive soul-searching, as flashbacks and asides dominate the script; externally, he wanders through the daily routine of his life with no real sense of direction.

John Cusack carries the movie, without a doubt, but the supporting cast deserves due credit for the colorfulness and authenticity of their performances. Lisa Bonet plays Marie DeSalle, local upstart musician and point of fixation for Rob's music-loving mind. Joan Cusack, John's sister and frequent costar, is her usual quirky, slightly unstable self as Laura's friend, Liz. Jack Black and Todd Louiso provide most of the comic relief as Barry and Dick, the neurotic pair of music enthusiasts Rob employs at his store. Catherine Zeta-Jones does an excellent job as Rob's stunning ex-girlfriend Charlie, and Tim Robbins appears briefly to play Ian, Rob's hizarre, ponytail-sporting neighbor.

Apart from the character story, High Fidelity is flavored with a strong sense of musical appreciation. One of Rob, Barry, and Dick's favorite pastimes is composing top five lists (best opening tracks, best songs about death, etc.), and the movie overflows with throwaway musical in-jokes and discussions.

The pace of the movie is excellently set throughout most of the movie, but the last twenty minutes of High Fidelity become rushed and underdeveloped; the movie was adapted from a novel by English author Nick Hornby, and a lot of later book narrative material was clearly cut for the screen adaptation. This blemish is the exception, however, and the majority of the movie develops with a lively and natural style. This is the cure for the common romantic comedy: a movie with intelligence and emotional authenticity. B+

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – If you cannot be helpful today, stay out of the way and do your best to not be a hindrance to other people. Play your part and please, try not to get lost!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Individuality is of the utmost importance to you today, and you're not likely to sacrifice any aspect of yourself for any reason. Conform and be normal.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may be leaning toward a decision that may surprise or even shock those in your inner circle. Still, you must be true to yourself. Just do it...get naked and roll in pudding.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may be making certain issues far too important today. Listen to what others have to say, and be willing to temper your own point of view. In other words...shut the hell up.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Your sober, practical side may be at war today with the part of you that wants to call it all off and head out in a brand-new direction. Beware of your dopelganger.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – A neat, clean and organized work space promotes neat, clean and organized work. You can only get things done in the right way, at the right time. Yeah bitch.

If you only took a brief look at the new Massachusetts softball complex this past weekend, than you might think that departed superstar Danielle Henderson was back on the mound for the Massachusetts softball team, blowing by hitters with a dominating fastball and pinpoint control.

On second glance you would realize that it was actually freshman Kaila Holtz pitching for the Maroon and White, but after this weekend, in which she picked up two wins against the likes of the Princeton Lady Tigers and the Syracuse Orangewomen, it appears she has the potential to fill the void left by Henderson's graduation.

"It is ridiculous to compare someone to Harry (Henderson)," said head coach Elaine Sortino, "but Kaila is definitely going to be quite a formidable pitcher in the future."

After this weekend it is hard to disagree with her.

On Sunday, in the first game of a doubleheader against Syracuse, Holtz allowed only two base runners the entire game on the way to the first one-hitter of her collegiate career. One of those was on an error by second baseman Ashley Bakken and the other was a line drive single that just bounced off the end of first baseman Brandi Cross's glove. These two plays were the only things that stopped Holtz from picking up a perfect game. She improved to 6-5 on the year.

Holtz credited the defense behind her and felt strong despite the fact that she felt that she could throw a lot harder.

"Kaila is not even at 50 percent of her potential yet," said Sortino.

Senior co-captain Nikki Faessler and junior Carrie Jeffries had some trouble getting outs against Princeton on Saturday, but Jeffries bounced back with a complete game win yesterday against Syracuse.

It was a good thing that Holtz fired such a gem because the Minutewomen had trouble getting their bats going. A sacrifice fly by centerfielder Teri Rooney in the first inning that scored shortstop Emily Robustelli, and another sac fly by designated hitter Debbie Tomoguchi in the second that plated third baseman Cherra Wheeler, were the only runs that UMass could muster on the way to a 2-0 win.

In the second game of the doubleheader, both teams exploded offensively. The Minutewomen were able to get on the board in the bottom of the first when Rooney scored on a Cross RBI single. Neither team was able to pick up a run in the second, but UMass scored another run in the third when pinch runner Kerri Landers came home after a Wheeler single. In the fifth, Wheeler stroked a long home run down the left field line that made the score 4-1. From here on things really began to get interesting.

Syracuse finally began to get their bats going in the top of the sixth, and roughed up starter Carrie Jeffries for three runs. This tied the score at four. In the bottom of the sixth, however, UMass took a phrase from the basketball team of a few years ago and refused to lose.

With one out, Rooney started things off with an infield single and advanced to second on a wild pitch. Cross then stepped to the plate and also picked up an infield single. Holtz, in the designated hitter spot, showed that she is a hitter as well as a pitcher by belting an RBI single to left. This made the score 5-4. Wheeler had a bunt single to load the bases, and then senior catcher Nikki Faessler lined a single to center that scored two runs and basically put the game away. Jeffries pitched a 1-2-3 seventh, and had her third win of the year despite giving up seven hits and four runs. UMass improved to 12-17 on the year with by picking up the 7-4 win.

"It helps a team's confidence to have a good offensive day," said Sortino, "and it was great to have a comeback win."

On Saturday the Minutewomen opened up play at their new complex with a doubleheader against Princeton. Even a coach like Sortino, with 21 years of experience behind her, admitted that she was a little nervous.

"I always have butterflies in my stomach before the home opener," she said.

In this game, Holtz almost duplicated the success she would have the next day by pitching all seven innings and giving up only two runs, one of them earned. "I felt honored to start the home opener, and it really was a special day," she said after the game.

The game remained in doubt until the fourth inning when right fielder Anna Perey reached on an error by the pitcher with one out. Bakken then reached on another error, this one by the third baseman. The next batter was Rooney and she blasted a pitch just over the right field fence for the first ever home run at the new softball complex. This made the score 3-2, and it stayed that way for the remainder of the game.

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, they could not complete the sweep of the Lady Tigers in the second game of the doubleheader despite the fact that they took a 3-0 lead into the top of seventh. Princeton finally got to starting pitcher Jen Hadley in this inning, and scored five runs off of her and relief pitcher Jeffries. In the bottom of the inning, the Maroon and White mounted a rally, but it fell just short when Wheeler lined into a double play to end the game moments after the Minutewomen closed the gap to 5-4.

Despite the loss, Sortino seemed happy with the way her team played over the weekend. "This team is going to be together for a long time," she said, "and we are going to be a good softball team."

UMass takes the field on April 4 at Central Connecticut before they begin the Atlantic 10 portion of their schedule at Virginia Tech on the eighth.

New field is grand but it's no Totman

Even if it wasn't nearly as dramatic as saying goodbye to the Boston Garden, it was still weird.

Looking desperately for some recognizable character, 160 fans relocated into the new UMass softball complex for the first time Saturday afternoon in the Southwest corner of campus.

Not everything was different from the old set-up, though. The Minutewomen, as usual, won their first game of the day against Princeton. Coach Elaine Sortino's trademark shades were still shiny and her bottom-of-the-inning pacing has already worn a path along the third-base coaches box.

Michael Jackson's voice blared over the same portable speakers. Many of the self-proclaimed softball experts still stood up against the backstop, as always, blocking everyone else's view.

So they felt at home, right? After all, this new facility is bigger, and there are finally some bleachers behind the home-run fence. Parking isn't a problem anymore. The scoreboard is bigger.

But the mound personality whom fans are accustomed to as the season-opening starter is now an assistant coach. Appropriately, her stand-in is a freshman, who never once played a game on the friendly confines of the former home of UMass softball: Totman Field.

A new stadium and a fresh set of players became the cod-liver oil of the sickly nostalgic fan, officially ushering in the new era. But that's not to say that those reluctant to move can't justify their separation anxiety.

While the new UMass softball complex is everything that the athletic department promised – state of the art, huge, and hooked-up – it seems to draw the same type of sentiment that its basketball counterpart did in 1993. Like the Mullins Center, the new home of the Minutewomen just doesn't have any character yet. Having coached inside the fences of Totman for almost 20 years, Sortino knows why.

"I see things on that field that nobody else sees, so it's kind of my field of dreams," she said of Totman. "My whole adult life has been spent on that field. That field is very, very special to me. People can look at it, and it doesn't look like much. But really, the birth, the growth, and the rise to excellence has all taken place there."

Well, what exactly does she see when she looks at her old field? Only some of the greatest moments of her life, she said.

"I remember our come-from behind win over Colorado State to go to the World Series in '97. I'll never forget Holly April driving the ball to the fence to beat UConn to take us to the World Series in '92. I see Harry (Danielle Henderson) striking people out. It wasn't the prettiest place in the world, but boy, it had character," Sortino said.

And what about the hill, where onlookers plopped, hoping a foul ball would come their way?

"Nothing beats the hill. The hill is the hill," Sortino admitted, smiling as she contemplated life without softball along the green monster of UMass.

But you've got to admire the anti-Bostonian attitude she's adopted about the new complex. Not one to toil too long with sentiment, Sortino simply sees the new park as the next step in sustaining UMass as a collegiate softball superpower.

"They'll never be another Totman, but as a coach, this place is so exciting, and it's a great way to practice," Sortino said. "It's a coach's dream come true."

UMass has not named it yet because they're waiting for the right person to whom they should dedicate it. Sortino Field? "I don't think so," she replied, even though they probably should name it after her... seeing how she put the program on the map.

"I want the new place to become 'the pit.'"

Without any bleachers that are at least six rows high, it looks like the new park isn't worthy of the cute diminutive. Besides, Totman was almost a pit, but in a playful way. Where else could you hear every word uttered in the dugout? Or jockey for space along the backstop? Or trip on a rock in the outfield?

And where else could Sortino – a character herself – have watched a once-lowly program mature on a field with as many amusing flaws as those of the players on it? Nowhere, of course.

PSU claws past UMass11-8

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Penn State	11
UMass	8

STATE COLLEGE, PA – It was a back-and-forth game turned wrong for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

After going goal for goal with Penn State in the early going, the Nittany Lions exploded with five unanswered goals from the 7:09 mark of the second quarter until there was just 6:01 reaming in the third. The explosion resulted in the Nittany Lions [4-4, 1-2 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference] leaving Jeffries Field with an 11-8 victory over the No. 16 Minutemen [4-3, 1-2 ECAC].

The loss not only moved Penn State into a tie with the Maroon and White, but it put an end to UMass' three-game winning streak.

"It was a tough loss for us. I didn't know if we were coming in today, if we were really prepared," head coach Greg Cannella said. "Out of warm-ups we were a little flat, and when you're playing somebody on the road and that team is Penn State, as good as they are, you can't come out flat."

The Lions' roar started when Don Mayerhofer fired a shot past UMass goalie Chris Campodonico. The senior tri-captain's goal gave PSU a 4-3 lead, a lead that they would never surrender. The Nittany Lions went on to score four additional goals before the Maroon and White were able to answer resulting in an 8-3 lead.

Penn State was able to continue to pad their lead because of sloppy play by the Minutemen. Mental mistakes, such as missing passes and offside calls, allowed PSU a lot of opportunities; they capitalized on the UMass mistakes.

"It wasn't that we weren't clicking, we didn't have the ball," Cancella said. "When you don't have the ball you can't score.

"We didn't take care of the ball, we didn't win faceoffs. I think that was the difference in the game," Cannella said.

The goal that broke the back of the Minutemen in this stretch was a Will Driscoll tally that came with just eight seconds to go in the first half. The Minutemen never led in the game, but on the previous three goals they were able to come back going goal for goal, but for the first time PSU gave itself the first two-goal lead of the afternoon.

Driscoll scored his second goal of the day early in the third quarter, and the goal was followed by tallies from Marshall Feldman and Tim Emmick.

The five consecutive Nittany Lions goals seemed to do the Minutemen in. Times of possession, as well as sloppy play, were what eventually sealed the fate of the Maroon and White.

During the span in which Penn State scored the five answered goals, the Minutemen had numerous quality scoring chances but were unable to finish. UMass' lack of scoring success was do in large part to the play of goalie Chris Garrity. The freshman, who was making his first collegiate start, turned aside 22 UMass shots en route to his first victory.

"He [Garrity] had a great day," Cannella said. "We weren't surprised that he was going to start. He finished up the game last week at UMBC [University of Maryland-Baltimore County] and did a fine job there. We talked to our guys about shooting high, and the first couple of shots we shot low. A good goalie once he gets the first couple saves in him, especially a young guy like that, got a little confidence and played great. He made some point blank outstanding saves today."

Of the 22 saves that Garrity made, few were easy as UMass peppered the freshman to the tune of 43 attempts. Most came from close range, but the native of Annapolis, MD., stood tall in the goal and as a result earned the win.

The performance of Garrity overshadowed the performance of Campolettano. The junior co-captain made 14 saves in the loss.

A ferocious Minutemen charge late in the fourth quarter brought the score to a respectable margin, but it was too little, too late. It took over 50 minutes for the Maroon and White to find the week spot in the PSU defense, but when they did, they were able to take advantage of the opportunities.

Rich Kunkel and Madigan led the charge for the Minutemen, each netting a pair of goals, while Kevin Dell, Keith Gahriellli, Marc Morley, and Dan Paccione rounded out the scoring column for UMass.

From the start, the Minutemen looked as if they were flat, which might have been attributed to playing three games in eight days, but Cannella was quick to not use that as an excuse for his team's performance.

"Maybe we were a little bit tired, but we play a lot of bodies and you can't use that as an excuse," Cannella said. "They saw the wounded dug out there and they took it to us, good teams will do that to you."

UMass will next be in action Saturday afternoon when it takes on the Retrievers of UMBC at Garber Field. Faceoff for the ECAC matchup is 1 p.m.

Kulak's timely hitting silences Dayton

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

When white marble clouds rise above a college baseball field, and the hoof beats of carriage horses rattle down the winding lanes adjacent to its third baseline, one must be trying to depict a perfect environment for baseball within the confines of Dayton, Ohio.

For the Massachusetts baseball team, the preceding picturesque version of baseball was, for the most part, kept intact this past weekend as the Minutemen took both games on Saturday from the Dayton Flyers with scores of 15-5 and 8-7. The teams were scheduled to play again on Sunday but the weather gods wouldn't allow it as the game was postponed because of rainy conditions.

Behind solid pitching by senior Travis Veracka in the first game of the doubleheader, the Minutemen were able to glide to a 15-5 win. Veracka struck out seven and gave up two runs while going the distance for his second win of the year.

On the offensive side, UMass came to the plate with 24's in their grips, scoring their 15 runs in the first five innings.

After scoring one run in the first frame thanks in part to a RBI double by sophomore Chris Morgan, the Minutemen offense erupted behind the batting of Morgan and Mike Kulak, scoring five runs in the second and six in the fifth.

In the second inning, Kulak ripped a two-out single to center field, driving in Gavin Clark and John Seed who had both singled to reach base. To cap the inning, Morgan lined a single to right field to drive in Nick Gourneault who had reached on an error.

After adding one run in the third, the Minutemen were able to plate two in the fourth thanks to a two-run single by Scott Anderson that scored Morgan and Aaron Senez.

In the fifth, Kulak drilled a double to the gap in left-center, driving in Clark and Shaun Skeffington. After stealing third, Kulak scored on a past ball. Morgan followed with a single and was brought home by Kevin O'Connell who homered to right center.

Gavin Clark belted his first home run of the season to lead UMass to a tough 8-7 win in the second game of the afternoon. After the solo smash by Clark, Morgan and O'Connell both lined RBI singles to give the Minutemen the lead at 4-3 at the middle of the third inning.

Kulak sealed the game for UMass in the top of the sixth inning with a one-out single to drive in Clark for the game-winning RBI. The Flyers plated two runs in the bottom of the sixth inning to close the gap to 8-7 but would get no closer.

Sophomore Jesse Santos pitched five and one-third innings to gain the victory, fanning four and watching six Flyer runners touch home plate in front of him. With the win, Santos goes to 2-2 on the season. Nick Skirkanich picked up his second save of the season, no-hitting Dayton for one and two-thirds innings, while striking out two Flyer batters.

The Flyers and Minutemen will conclude their conference series with a nine-inning game today that is slated for a noon start.

Schedule, Flying Dutchwomen catch up with UMass

HEMPSTEAD, NY – After breaking out of their scoring slump with 30 points between two victories in two days, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finally ran out of gas.

In its third game since last Wednesday, when the Minutewomen clobbered Vermont, 17-2, UMass lost a 9-7 shootout at Hofstra on Saturday.

A game removed from Thursday's 13-12 sprint against New Hampshire, the Maroon and White couldn't catch up with the Flying Dutchwomen.

"We had a tough week this week," UMass defender Melissa Miele said. "We had three games in four days, and that can be tiring. Still, I don't want to use that as an excuse [for losing]."

The home team got on the scoreboard first, as junior Kathleen McPike cut to the UMass goal and Kelly Dodson put it in the net with 26:07 showing on the clock. Hofstra doubled their lead roughly two and a half minutes later when McPike fed Janet Walsh to make up the tally to 2-0.

After 9:28 had ticked away, the Minutewomen began their retaliation with an unassisted Stephanie Pavlick tally. Less than two minutes later, the game was all knotted up as Miele ducked into the heart of the Dutch defense and whipped the tying shot past Hofstra goalie Jackie Carroll.

The cat-and-mouse procedure continued, as Dutchwomen midfielder Kathleen Mikowski bolted away from the crowd and scored a fast break goal to push her team to a 3-2 lead, before Minutewoman Kara DePaula beat Carroll to tie it up again.

Massachusetts couldn't keep up a sustained offensive for the rest of the half, allowing Hofstra to build a 6-3 lead, built on McPike and Walsh's respective second goals, along with a score by Jessica Gaither.

"Defensively, we had a couple of times today when we had trouble clearing the ball out, and we can't play defense for over 20 minutes [in a half], and that's what we did today," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "Their time of possession was greater than ours, and it showed on the scoreboard."

The Minutewomen broke out of their 17:35 scoring drought by capitalizing on an abrupt offensive with only 17 seconds left in the half. Senior co-captain Rebecca Minaker notched a free position goal to cut the deficit to 6-4.

Aside from an almost immediate McPike score to start the final half – the junior finished her hat trick 14 seconds into the frame – UMass took early offensive control after the break.

A half a minute later, Miele scored her second goal, and at the 26:15 mark, senior Stephanie Pavlick cut the Hofstra lead back down to one with a falling shot across her body and past Carroll's right leg.

Mikowski assisted a Gina Dinisio goal with 20:35 to go to keep the Minutewomen at arm's length, while Walsh put the punctuation on her own hat trick approximately two minutes later to make the score 9-6.

A Minaker free position goal with 6:02 remaining would prove to be the final score of the contest, ending the runaround at 9-7.

The duration of the game was played out as the Minutewomen came frustratingly close to cutting into the lead, while Nardi dug in to keep the game in reach. Barnes also noted that senior co-captain Lynne Young and classmate Jessica Passanese played "tremendous" on defense.

"We had our opportunities to score, we had great one-on-one looks," Barnes said. "The players, offensively, moved well. Just when it came time to put the ball in the cage, we didn't finish."

The threat of a comeback dimmed when defender Colleen Wales and attack Fay Naber were both sent to the bench with yellow cards with less than two minutes remaining, and finally faded to black as Minutewoman Rachel Ingraffea hit the post on UMass' last scoring opportunity with 40 seconds left.

"Colleen got called for a slash and Fay got called for a check to the body," Barnes said. "They were given yellow cards, out for two minutes."

"I thought we played really well today, and we had a few mental mistakes," Miele said. "We probably should have won the game. I thought we were going to win the game, but I think we played really well, and I don't think anyone's really disappointed in the way that they played."

Honors' Nolan speaks

By Joseph Collins
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center, University of Massachusetts Commonwealth College Interim Dean Linda Nolan spoke to attendees about pursuing the position of dean of the honors college.

Time for the informative session was allocated to 30 minutes. The session was mainly focused on what the Commonwealth College is, and how Nolan feels it has improved. It then concluded with a 30-minute question and answer session.

During the informative session, facts were given on the number of improvements in the honors program since 1994. Students enrolled in the program have increased from five percent of the UMass population in 1994 to 15 percent in 1999. Enriched honors courses have risen from 102 to 263, honors colloquiums are up 321 from 148, and independent honors classes have risen from 37 to 571 since 1994.

She focused on the latter, stating that, "Independent activity is a sign of a strong honors department."

She commented that the college was created in response to a general perception from Massachusetts residents that higher public education in the state was inferior, and that since its conception that perception has changed as there are, "...top students going to Commonwealth College."

Her mission with the college is for it "...to be the most distinctive honors college in the nation."

She feels that the belief that Massachusetts' public higher education is strong will help public institutions attain state allocated funding.

Other facts given were student demographics: 46 percent of Commonwealth College students are male, 54 percent female, 78 percent are Massachusetts residents, 22 percent are from out of state, 7 percent are minority, 2 percent are international students and 90 percent are white or did not report their ethnicity. She also stressed that 14 percent of students did not report their ethnicity and that, "...many of them were minorities."

When questioned about the number of minority students in the college and why they are so few, Nolan responded that many minorities were offered spots in the college but chose not to join. She continued, "Concern is with students who have high, high school rank and are minority. We will address those students [at UMass] with a 3.2 and get them into the college."

She did not specify how she would go about increasing the number of ALANA students in the Commonwealth College, only that it would be done and students need to be part of the solution. She mentioned that the minority population in the state of Massachusetts is small, and that, "[The] University has to pull in a larger number of minority students."

Nolan said that the perception of the college from the student body of the University, "...from reading the Collegian is white elitist. [We need the student body] to know that anyone who has a 3.2 can join."

28 students live in learning communities in Southwest, 172 in Talent Advancement Programs, and 192 at large. In Orchard Hill 200 out of 1400 (15 percent) are Commonwealth College students living in learning communities.

Nolan stressed this point, commenting that the college is "...not engulfing Orchard Hill."

In response to curiosity, she also gave an account of what her days consist of, going over the number of hours that she spends in meetings, at appointments and in other places.

When asked by an attendee if she thought that she spent too much time outside of the college and not enough interacting with members of the college, she responded: "I think it's a weakness."

However, she concluded, "I think the dean will have to be external, the associate dean will work with the students."

Stressing student involvement within the college, she put attention to the Commonwealth College Student Council, which was formed this past semester. Surprisingly, Commonwealth College members in attendance were not aware of the group's existence. This brought up the point that communication within the college is a major problem. Nolan expressed that she is helping to clear up this lack of information through an upcoming honors newsletter, a chat site on the web and an assigned e-mail responder. She wanted students to express their concerns and address them to her and the college.

Increasing diversity and communication within the college, she said, were two main areas of concern for her. Another issue of attendees was the removal of present Commonwealth College students from their learning communities to make room for next year's class. Nolan said that this "...is not

Raid leads to discovery of illegal bar

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Police Department was involved in a raid of Sigma Alpha Mu, a fraternity house located on 595 North Pleasant St., after police officers dressed in plain clothing entered early on Saturday morning to discover an illegal bar operating inside the University of Massachusetts off-campus house.

The police were alerted to the activity several weeks ago, according to a Gazette article published yesterday. There were reports of illegal bars operating somewhere along North Pleasant Street's "fraternity row," Amherst Police Detective David Knightly said.

According to reports, plain-clothed officers were invited into the fraternity house and saw evidence that large quantities of alcoholic beverages were being sold.

Returning to the station, the Amherst Police obtained search warrants and uniformed officers returned and entered the building at approximately 1 a.m., the report stated. The police confiscated alcohol and other evidence.

"We are in the process of determining who is going to be charged with what," Knightly said in a statement.

Criminal charges are expected to be brought up in connection with the incident. At least 200 people were in the building at the time of the raid.

Paying the cost

AC announces fee hike

By Melissa Hammel

Last week the Amherst College Board of Trustees announced a 3.3 percent increase in fees to go into effect for the college's 2000-2001 academic year.

The college revealed that costs for the upcoming semester would be a total of $32,400 up from this year's $31,360 costs. This fee includes tuition, room and board and is the lowest percentage increase that the college has seen in 35 years. The college estimated a total cost for the entire year for students to be between $34,375 and $36,325.

Concurrently, the Board also approved a new expenditure of upwards of $90,000 to the financial aid budget for the college. This new venture will give the college the ability to reduce or completely eliminate loans for a range of low and middle-income families. The new measure will provide support for current students as well as newly admitted students.

The fee itself makes up about 60 percent of the operating budget of the institution. The endowment for the college, which as of June 30 stood at $634.5 million dollars, made up 22 percent of the operating budget. Gifts to the college made up about 12 percent of the budget.

According to information provided by the college, the actual cost of educating a student at Amherst College is actually $50,000, however income from the endowment and gifts to the college help to subsidize that amount, especially for students that do not receive financial aid.

Increased financial aid for students is one of the priorities of The Amherst College Campaign, which seeks to raise $200 million dollars as a campaign total, $38 million of which is dedicated to financial aid. To date, the campaign has raised a total of $24 million dollars towards that goal.

According to a statement made by Amherst College President Tom Gerety, "While Amherst's financial aid policies have always led the way in emphasizing low loan-indebtedness, we are pleased to be able to take these additional steps to further enhance our already sufficient financial aid program."

The college operates on a need-blind admissions policy that helps to ensure that student admissions are not effected by financial issues. The school also has a policy that provides only need-based scholarships to students rather than merit scholarships. Finally, in order to make the school more financially accessible to both current and potential students the college ensures that students will receive financial aid equal to their determined need.

Despite seemingly high costs, the college has been ranked as "Best Value" by U.S. News and World Report and has also been ranked sixth in the 1999 Kiplinger's Personal Financial Magazine survey of the "Top 100 Values in Private Colleges."

Gerety went on to comment that the new financial aid program helped to reaffirm the commitment by the college to affordable education. "We're also proud that this action reinforces Amherst's longstanding commitment to equity and access in financial aid by providing additional support to those students and families that need it most."

Engineering among top schools

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

U.S. News & World Report has ranked UMass' College of Engineering in the top 50 of their list of "America's Best Graduate Schools."

When compared with 218 other engineering graduate programs nationwide, UMass came in at number 49.

"We're pleased with the national recognition of the quality of our program," Thomas Blake, associate dean of the College of Engineering said in a statement. "Such an achievement recognizes the high quality of the faculty and their research and teaching."

Also included in the article were the linguistics and polymer science programs, which both took the number one spot in their respective categories, and the Master of Fine Arts program in creative writing, which was ranked tenth.

"These rankings confirm the strength of our programs, and also indicate the University's leadership in a wide range of disciplines," Cora B. Marrett, Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs and UMass provost said in a statement to the press.

Graduate programs in business, law, medicine, education, engineering and allied health specialties are ranked yearly, while other science and humanities programs are ranked every three years.

The magazine, which will be on newsstands April 3, contains only some of the rankings. The rest can be found in "America's Best Graduate Schools," the magazine's guidebook, or at http://www.usnews.com.

The rankings are based on such criteria as student selectivity, faculty resources and research activity.

Also included in the ranking process are reputation rankings from both deans and faculty of the program and prospective employers of graduating students.

Other Massachusetts schools in the article included the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (number one in Engineering and number three in Business) and Harvard University (ranked number one in Business, Medicine and Education and third in Law).

Harvard and M.I.T. were also both in the top ten for their Doctorate programs in Biology, Chemistry, Economics and Geology.

Harvard was also in the top ten for Doctorate programs in History and English.

M.I.T. took the number one rank for its Ph.D. program in Computer Science.

Federal agencies prepare for protest

By Mike Causey
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Downtown federal agencies – anxious to be prudent not panicky – are still deciding what, if anything to do about Monday, April 17. That is scheduled to be the second day of what could be massive and messy demonstrations aimed at international organizations close to the White House.

Environmentalists, trade unionists and other activists will start arriving April 15, then hold demonstrations April 16 and 17 around the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, which have meetings scheduled for the latter two days. The two agencies face each other across 19th Street Northwest in an area that is often gridlocked on a good day. Many agencies that aren't targets of the demonstrators are within walking – and traffic jam-range. Demonstrators hope to shut down stretches of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Their goals include blocking administration plans to give China normal trade status, and they are demanding that the debt of Third World nations be forgiven and more money spent on the AIDS epidemic in Africa.

You can track the demonstrators' official plans on the Web site www.a16.org.

Security experts don't want a repeat of the Nov. 30-Dec. 3 riots in Seattle. That city's image as a misty, laid-back city of coffee bars and "Frasier" was shattered by demonstrations that shut down a World Trade Organization conference. TV news was filled with scenes of tear gas, looting and sometimes bloody battles between anti-WTO demonstrators and police.

Parts of Seattle were overwhelmed and trashed. Many businesses were shut down, and many office workers – including thousands of Seattle-based federal employees – couldn't get to work or were told to stay home. Many of the same demonstrators are expected in Washington this month.

The official line on the April protests is that this will be just another demonstration, of the kind Washington is very good at handling and surviving.

But law enforcement personnel are taking extraordinary precautions and receiving crowd control training. There has been nothing like it since the recent NATO summit meeting here.

When the NATO meeting was first announced, federal officials said they wouldn't let the summit disrupt the city. But as the time for the meeting drew closer, concerns about security and traffic grew. Finally, federal agencies that had scoffed at the idea of a shutdown decided to close, even though some were miles from the NATO meetings.

So what about April 17?

"If you are asking me if there is any kind of panic or if there are plans to shut down federal agencies on April 17, the answer is no," a federal official who is involved in planning said Monday.

He said he knew of no plans to close any federal buildings, including those that are neighbors of the IMF and World Bank, or to encourage employees to take annual leave.

That is the official line. And there is no reason to believe it isn't true. For now.

Border occupation end leaves soldiers with dilemma

By Tracy Wilkinson
Los Angeles Times

FATIMA GATE, Israel-Lebanon Border – As Israel intensifies preparations to end its 22-year occupation of southern Lebanon, a nagging question looms: what will happen to the thousands of Lebanese soldiers who fought as Israel's proxies?

On Monday, the commander of the Israel-allied South Lebanon Army (SLA) proclaimed that his men will remain in southern Lebanon to "defend the land," preferring the risk of death over life as refugees.

Gen. Antoine Lahad also said his men – about 2,500 to 3,000 fighters – plus more than 70,000 family members and associates would be willing to accept Lebanese rule if and only if they are granted a blanket amnesty.

"Our men prefer to die and not become refugees," Lahad said. "They prefer to go the Masada way" – a reference to the legendary last stand of Jewish Zealots in A.D. 73, who committed suicide rather than submit to the Romans, a seminal tale of Jewish heroism.

Lahad spoke at a chaotic news conference at an Israeli military post on the border with southern Lebanon. His appearance seemed designed to address mounting speculation over the fate of the SLA, who have fought alongside Israeli troops for years and are branded traitors by the government in Beirut. Many commanders have been sentenced to death in absentia by Lebanese courts.

With peace talks with Syria, which controls Lebanon, at a seemingly insurmountable impasse, Israel has accelerated plans for a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon to end a long, deadly war of attrition between Israel and Syrian-backed Islamic Lebanese militants.

Many of the Lebanese who fight with Israel fear they will be slaughtered once Israel departs. The Israeli government has spoken repeatedly of its "moral obligation" to the Christian-led SLA and their families, and plans are reportedly under consideration to resettle some of them in Israeli villages and kibbutzim.

Israeli Brig. Gen. Benny Gantz, who appeared with Lahad at the news conference, said the Israeli army is preparing to accommodate any SLA militiamen and families who wish to take refuge in Israel.

"We have an obligation to the SLA and the security zone population," Gantz said. "We will make all the arrangements to assure their safety including acceptance in Israel. ... We are ready. Whether they come or not is up to them."

But Lahad, to the evident surprise of Gantz and other Israeli officers, said his troops were choosing a different option: to defend their land to the death. Whether there is fighting in the future, Lahad said, depends on the response of Lebanese authorities and the Shiite Muslim guerrillas of Hezbollah.

Lahad, who is 71, has a house in France where his family has relocated. He has said he would go into exile when Israel withdraws from Lebanon, but that was when the pullback was to be accompanied by a peace deal with Syria.

With the lack of a peace agreement making withdrawal more dangerous and volatile, Lahad said he now plans to remain.

"I will be viewed as a traitor if I leave now," said Lahad.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, speaking after a meeting with U.S. Secretary of Defense William Cohen, played down the threat of intensified cross-border attacks into Israel from Hezbollah. Cohen weighed in, saying that the United States had no plans to add troops to a U.N. peacekeeping force along the border since 1978.

Barak reiterated that chances for resuming peace negotiations with Syria were "quite low," which makes the unilateral withdrawal – dubbed operation "Morning Twilight" by the Israeli army – all the more likely. He said Israel would withdraw to the international border, a statement meant to dispel reports that the Jewish state might attempt to hold on to several outposts inside Lebanon to better defend its northern towns.

breaking up communities, its logistics. Again, this is the first year...people can remain in their area...[we are] working with housing to have a certain number of beds reserved for Commonwealth College students."

Student response to the discussion was primarily negative.

Sophomore Jennifer Casavant, a Psychology and Spanish double major, said "I came here, got what I expected, [she was] very defensive, condescending in a lot of ways... I was disappointed, she talked about Commonwealth College itself and not on a personal level... not what her weaknesses and strengths were."

In response to a request to list some personal weaknesses she has, she said that she is a "...goal oriented person, a focused person... because of that, especially being in science, [she] feels that [she's] probably under enormous pressure to maintain resources," Casavant commented.

History major Jamie Jee, a junior, stated, "She seemed to think that problems of diversity in Commonwealth College were attributed to choice of students in choosing not to come here. It seemed she felt the current problem is not her own agency but external."

Michael Whitehouse, an sophomore Economics major and an SGA Senator representing Orchard Hill felt that, "her answers were evasive... she just gave excuses."

Annan gives message of hope in outline of U.N.

By Colum Lynch
The Washington Post

UNITED NATIONS – Secretary General Kofi Annan outlined his vision of the United Nations in the 21st century – a world body that would use "smart sanctions" to punish dictators while sparing innocent civilians, enlist corporate help for disaster victims and bring the Internet to the Third World.

The proposals, contained in a 57-page "Millennium Report," represent Annan's most ambitious effort yet to shape the future of the United Nations and put his personal imprint on it.

Annan said Monday that he hoped the report would stimulate debate among world leaders who will gather in New York for a Sept. 6-8 summit to develop a long-term agenda for the U.N. It contains recommendations on a dizzying array of issues, from curbing illegal traffic in small arms to reversing global warming.

The report "attempts to present a comprehensive account of the main challenges facing humanity as we enter the 21st century, combined with a plan of action for dealing with them," Annan told reporters. "That may sound absurdly ambitious, but if the United Nations does not attempt to chart a course for the world's people in the first decades of the new millennium, who will?"

Annan directed his most severe criticism at the Security Council's use of economic sanctions to try to change the behavior of such states as Iraq and Libya, saying innocent civilians, not the ruling elite, bear the brunt of the suffering. He said the council should give serious consideration to studies underway in Germany, Switzerland, Britain and Canada to find ways to target leaders rather than whole populations.

The United Nations should work more closely with the private sector to harness information technology to improve the lives of the most disadvantaged people, Annan said. He warned that governments that restrict access to the Internet – as Malaysia, Cuba and Saudi Arabia have tried to do and – "are going to fail."

"They are depriving their people, their nations, of great opportunities by trying to limit access to these technologies," Annan told reporters, without specifying any countries. "They shouldn't waste resources trying to block it."

Annan announced that the United Nations, the International Committee of the Red Cross and Ericsson, the Swedish telecommunications company, are jointly designing a program to provide round-the-clock mobile and satellite communications to relief workers, date medical information via the Internet, he said.

Congressional power checked

By Joan Biskupic
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON –In a case that thrusts the Supreme Court into the perennial controversy over legal aid for the poor, justices agreed Monday to decide whether Congress can prohibit federally funded lawyers from challenging welfare laws on behalf of their indigent clients.

The court agreed to review a ruling that the restriction on lawyers funded by the Legal Services Corporation discriminates against particular viewpoints and violates the First Amendment.

The appeal will be an important test of what strings government may attach to its funds in an array of programs. But it will particularly affect the federally financed legal services program, frequently attacked in Congress for pursuing "liberal causes" and repeatedly subjected to restrictions on what kinds of cases its lawyers can take.

Established in 1974, the nonprofit corporation was designed to help the poor with basic legal problems by providing grants and other assistance to local legal aid offices.

From the outset, Congress restricted the kinds of advocacy that would be financed, prohibiting LSC lawyers from working on cases related to abortion, school desegregation or military desertion.

The condition at issue in the new dispute allows LSC lawyers to seek welfare benefits for individual clients but bars litigation that aims to change federal or state welfare law. It was adopted in 1996, along with restrictions on class-action lawsuits, claims for lawyers' fees, and the representation of prisoners and certain immigrants.

Lawyers for a New York woman who sought legal aid after her welfare benefits were cut say the new restriction "is particularly damaging in this era of welfare reform ... (as) states are experimenting with a wide range of welfare responses – some of them far more punitive and arbitrary than Congress could have contemplated."

The lawyers, who are affiliated with New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, claim the provision unconstitutionally bars attorneys for the poor from questioning the legality of new welfare regulations.

In its decision siding with the challengers, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit said the regulation allowing LSC lawyers to bring individual welfare claims but not to challenge the welfare laws discriminates against certain points of view.

"It accords funding to those who represent clients without making any challenge to existing rules of law, but denies it to those whose representation challenges existing rules," the appeals court said. "It clearly seeks to discourage challenges to the status quo."

The Legal Services Corp. and the Justice Department, which intervened on behalf of the Clinton administration, contend the welfare-related rules are permitted under a 1991 high court ruling that gave Congress considerable latitude to define the limits of programs it funds.

In that 5-to-4 decision, the court upheld a restriction on the discussion of abortion by doctors who worked in a government-financed health clinic.

Legal Services Corp. lawyers say that decision in Rust v. Sullivan© allows Congress to choose whether to subsidize various points of view without violating the First Amendment. The Justice Department, in a separate appeal, asserted that Congress could choose to pay for lawsuits in which poor people seek benefits under the law but not lawsuits that would undermine the law.

The consolidated cases of Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez© and United States v. Velazquez© will be heard during the term that begins in October.

Reno uses ads to back U.S. decision

By Emily Roper
Cavalier Daily (U. Virginia)

(U-WIRE) CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. – U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno defended the United States' decision to return Elian Gonzales to his native Cuba during her keynote address Saturday at a conference celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Virginia Journal of International Law.

"We are committed to doing what we believe to be the law," Reno said in regards to the Gonzales case.

For several months, U.S. courts had been trying to determine who had legal custody of Gonzales, a young Cuban refugee, whose mother drowned as the two fled to America. His father wanted Gonzales returned to Cuba while American relatives claimed custody and wanted Gonzales to remain in the United States.

The United States now has decided that Gonzales' father had legal custody and ordered the boy returned to Cuba.

Reno, who has been at the center of making decisions in this controversial case, fielded several questions regarding the Gonzales case following her keynote speech.

Reno said she is trying not to politicize the Gonzales issue.

In her keynote address Reno also discussed how "crime has become international." As technology and Internet access has increased, international crime has become more commonplace, she said.

It is now easier for criminals in any part of the world to commit crimes in other countries without leaving their homes. This type of international crime "makes the world seem a world without borders," Reno said.

In order to combat growing concern for international crime, countries need to begin working together rather than concentrating only on their own concerns, Reno said.

"We will not be able to face solely domestic issues in this century, in this millennium," she said. "We need to give attention to the whole world rather than a small piece."

Reno now is establishing a program called "Project Map the World" which will provide countries a chance to look at international criminal issues and work together to find solutions, she added.

"My goal, my dream is a network of sharing and trust," Reno said.

She said countries should begin by looking at issues such as fraud, gun smuggling and organized crime.

She also stressed the importance of helping developing countries establish their own democracies, which would help foster a stronger community of nations around the world.

AU students brace for rally

By Brooke Summers
The Eagle (American U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – Local activist organizations, the Metropolitan Police Department and American University students are hurriedly preparing for a massive demonstration, which will attempt to shut down the April 16-17 meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Hailed by the press as the "Sequel to Seattle," thousands of people from around the world are scheduled to descend upon Washington, D.C. in a battle against corporate globalization, activist organization Jubilee 2000 Campus Outreach Coordinator Mara Vandersoice said.

A number of groups, including Jubilee 2000, the Alliance for Global Justice, 50 Years is Enough, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch, Friends of the Earth Network, Greenpeace and Global Exchange hope the event will have an even more profound and peaceful impact than Seattle's World Trade Organization protests earlier this year.

Jubilee 2000, a national campaign which crusades for financial institutions such as the World Bank and the IMF to rid underdeveloped nations of outstanding and often larger debts, spoke of their participation in the demonstrations, known to organizers as A-16.

"We are one of the organizations who will be involved in the implementation of A-16. However, the USA campaign of Jubilee 2000 is our focus," Vandersoice said. "About 40 different activist organizations around the D.C. are involved in our mass national Mobilization to encourage debt cancellation of impoverished nations."

According to Vandersoice, approximately 15 to 20 thousand people will gather on the National Mall on April 9 to listen to entertainers and prominent speakers representing other nations' Jubilee 2000 campaigns.

The most exciting part of the day, organizers say, will occur later that evening. Participants will join together to form a human chain that will wrap around various areas of the city and end directly across the street from IMF and World Bank headquarters near George Washington University.

"The human chain serves a dual purpose," she said. "It is meant to symbolize the nations which are chained by debt, and it is a demonstration of human solidarity as well."

Former AU junior Kadd Stephens, who has chosen to pursue activism full-time, is a primary facilitator for AU's student involvement in the demonstration.

"This [demonstration] is not a hierarchical. People are organized into smaller groups called affinity groups by consensus. I am helping to create the structure which facilitates affinity groups the ability to plug in."

Stephens estimates that approximately 75 to 100 AU students will be participating on April 16. AU senior Cindy Breunig helped to negotiate a plan with AU Residential Life and Housing Services to provide approximately 200 college students from schools such as Cornell University and Wesleyan University temporary housing in the formal lounges of the residence halls during the demonstration.

"We have yet to meet with the RAs and RDs to solidify plans, but if this happens, we will have the opportunity to meet other student activists. The most important thing isn't just the demonstration, but the educational programs associated with it as well."

The Metropolitan Police Department is also preparing for the protests. MPD has a considerable amount of experience handling protests of this magnitude.

"I am not allowed to disclose how many officers will be at the protests, but the department responsible for handling such matters, the CDU [Civil Disturbance Unit] is on it," said MPD spokesman Joe Gentile.

In preparation, the MPD is training 60 officers daily in specialized courses to ready an army of 1,500 for the demonstrations, the Washington Post reported Sunday.

Hundreds of local and federal agency officers will also be on standby throughout the duration of the protests.

"We're the peace keepers here. People have a right to express free speech, and the IMF and the World Bank have a right to hold a meeting," Gentile said. "Our purpose is to protect all of those rights."

Our Opinion
SGA making strides

Immediately after their recently completed elections, the Student Government Association started to do things right. Considering especially that they passed Title V, a document that gives power to Area Government and House Councils, the SGA has taken a serious step forward in doing good for all students.

No confidence votes for administration are one thing, as they change anything and merely state a position; pro-active votes for students are quite another thing altogether. Giving House Councils and Area Governments the opportunity finally organize, the SGA has empowered groups that can more closely interact with their constituents. One of the SGA's biggest drawbacks is its separation from students, so while they act on behalf of students, they aren't out there being with students. But Area Governments, and, perhaps even moreso, House Councils can attach to the students that the SGA might miss because of their distance. Both focus on a specific area of campus, be it a housing area or a dorm within that area, more students are accessible, if for no other reason than the specificity of the governing body.

These are the things that bring votes and support from a lethargic student body. Involvement is the kind of bait that encourages voters, something that despite recently larger elections, the SGA could use.

However, as is most SGA legislation, Title V is fraught with controversy, as the rewritten document left out the Greek Area Government, an organization meant to represent the 1,000 or so students who are members of the Greek community. This has enraged some members of the Senate, notably Amy Pellegrino, chairman of the SGA's Ways and Means Committee, who feels that the document should have only been passed if all students were going to be represented.

The debate surrounding the document focuses on Pellegrino's claim that almost 1,000 students are no longer represented. Views opposed to Pellegrino's have maintained that the Greek area will be dealt with later to the problem off dual representation; students living on-campus and being members of a Fraternity or Sorority would get two votes when it came to the SGA. This argument maintains that the Greek area should be considered a commuter area and represented as such.

The Daily Collegian feels that a decision about the Greek area should be made as soon as possible, and that decision should lump the Greek area in with other commuters.

Because of their strong voter base, and the generally low turnout in Commuter elections, including Rob Moore winning the position of Commuter Area Governor with an abominably low 12 votes, the Greek Affairs, with even the barest minimum of organization could win elections. They would still get their representation, and the problems with Title V representation would be solved.

We can only hope that the SGA quickly solves these problems, as they detract from the initial strength of the passed document.

Homogenized living anyone?

It is written in the Book of Boo that, "When you are at the top of the world, it's easy to be generous to those below you." When you are a member or the elite, it is easy to feel enlightened when it comes to the world. However, when you must actually experience the situations you so proudly claimed to be knowledgeable of, you run into a brick wall.

As a white upper-middle-class male, I have seen the world through a certain set of lenses. I was taught to respect women and minorities, no matter the color and/or creed. I was the only white male to perform every cultural dance in my high school multicultural week. In my mind, the ideal of ethnic harmony always seemed to be the norm. The social group I hung out with was diverse, as were the people I worked with. After a lifetime living in comfy Suburbia (a pleasant, but uneventful town called Bedford, MA), I felt like I was comfortably living and working in a diverse gender/ethnic community. After all, I lived with people from Morocco, Japan, Chile and Jamaica during my tenure down at Walt Disney World. In that, it's easy to think that I had successfully intergraded into a diverse world.

Well, thinking that you are comfortable with the world and actually being comfortable with the world are two very separate states. In fact, just thinking that everything is all right with everyone is not only naive, but it perpetuates the cycle of social imbalance. In working with many diverse groups, and visiting some friends at Mt. Holyoke College, I found out to my chagrin that my happy go lucky view of the world did not comply with my feelings of anxiety when the tables turned on me.

I was visiting a friend at Mt. Holyoke on a Thursday night when reality first slapped me in the face. I watched my friend perform in Mt. Holyoke's Junior Show, a tradition composed of skits, songs, and such. While I found the jabs at UMass, particularly the men of UMass, amusing, I was very self-conscious of the fact that I was one of the few males in the audience. That feeling of self-iety increased when I went to a party later that evening only to be a single guy in a room of women.

Boo Downs

I must stop here for a moment. Being a male in this society, being the only guy in an all women party should be heaven on Earth. It is stereotypically every male's dream to be surrounded by attractive, inebriated women in a consequence-free environment. Well, my friends, it is not all that it's cracked up to be. To elaborate, I ask you to think about a particular scenario. You are at the party, which as usually composed of desperate guys trying to cart off one of the few women away for a night of animal passion. Now, think yourself as one of those few women at this imaginary party (If you are a women, think about your last UMass party). You probably feel like a lamb in a pack of starving wolves. On a lighter note (after all, you probably came to this party to partake in animal passion), the worst you can feel is self-conscious, as you are being reviewed by snakedom. I suppose that some people enjoy being objectified, or just got used to being looked at with hungry eyes. While not the predator myself, I thought I understood the plight of being placed under a microscope. That statement could not be further from the truth. I felt like I wanted to crawl into a hole and disappear; so much for the ultimate male fantasy.

Being human, I fear things I cannot understand. In this, I am a racist. My work often brings me in contact with people of all colors and creeds. Professionally, I have no problem working with people of any persuasion. However, in social situations, I feel unconfortable and self-conscious. It is not the matter of color or of creed, but the culture I do not understand. Thus, my social circle consists of mostly white males who hang out at Applebee's on a regular basis. While this culture conveniently alienates us socially from a large percentage of the population, it is my little niche. While rhetorically and professionally I am in support of "us all getting along," I do not hang out with Blacks, Latinos, or any other culturally enriched group. I do not hate or dislike them; rather, I have little to do with them socially. Certainly this homogenized heterogeneity does little to rectify the separation of cultural groups and subgroups in our society.

Is there any hope for ignoramuses such as myself? The best approach would be the integration and education of diverse groups of children at an early age. No education lends us on the path of ignorance and inequity. Current education gives us the false impression that everyone just should get along with no difficulties. What we need is an education that stresses that while the final product should be racial and gender equality, the solution requires a long and sometimes difficult process. The success of education will be apparent when people deal with each other on a level, unbiased field. Until then, I won't be going near any Mt Holyoke parties.

Monday: Dear Diary,

I just clicked out of Non-Union Labor 271. I have a ten minute break before I have to log into Keys for Success 113; just enough time for a piping hot Starbuck and a quick entry. REMINDER: download e-class notes for Climbing the Corporate Ladder 346 by 4 P.M. tomorrow!!! I'm feeling kind of bummed because I received nothing but BC's on my mid term resumes. If I persist in this mediocrity, I'll never get into the Sacred Order of Honor Students next semester. I try so damn hard. I never skip my e-lectures and Advisor 342-id emails that I'm doing fine. I can't decide if I want to eat at On the Border or Outback Steak House tonight. Had a bitch of a time with the Nasdaq crossword puzzle today; couldn't think of a five-letter "soft-drink of a new generation." Gotta go. Kess to Success 113 waits for no one...

Tuesday: Dear Diary,

Great news! After camping out last night to get a good spot in line, I found out at Whitmore that I'm only 1,734th on the waiting list for corporate financial aid! I'm crossing fingers and toes! If I get Corp-Aid, I could have my student loans paid off by 2030...32 at the latest. Maybe even in '28 if I grant Kaiser Permanente bone marrow rights in their HMO loan deferment program. I'm psyched. My student unit voted to eat at Pizza Hut today. I had a craving for Taco Bell, but I wasn't about to rock the boat. If I have learned nothing else as a UMass student, which I know is a privilege and not a right, I know that the most important thing is to be a team player. You can't last long in the real business world if you just did whatever you felt like. I wouldn't even become a regional manager with that kind of attitude. Gotta go, I promised my seven lounge mates that I would watch the Gillette Patriots game with them...

Wednesday: Dear Diary,

Life sucks. I could only get into two e-classes next semester. Looks like I'm gonna have to embark on the prestigious "seven-year-plan." Could be worse, I suppose. I could be at a community college or even worse, busting my ass in the strip mines or the sweat factories. I wish that my parents could afford private school. How do they expect 85,000 students to get into an e-course list with a 50,000-modem capacity? I'd complain, but the Student Service Dept. just runs you in circles. Besides, the administration's budget calls for the renovation of the Chancellor-for-life's estate as a fiscal priority. I wish I could get into the Sacred Order of Honor Students! Real Professors...in person! Classes like they used to be before the University was sold to Microsoft. I have to study more. Gotta go. Bill Gates is addressing the nation again...

Thursday: Dear Diary,

THIRSTY THURSDAY! My lounge mates and I will probably head up-town to the Coke Spoke, the NBC, or maybe down to Merril-Lynch's Westview. I don't know. I can't spend too much credit though. My Off Campus Money Plan card is running a little low on swipes. You would think that the W.T.O. could lower the tariffs on Heineken. But I guess it's like anything else: if beer corporations and bar corporations didn't mark up their prices, how would they be able to pay the understandably staggering salaries of their execs and stay competitive? A team needs leadership. That's what college has taught me. The market is rightly the one to shoulder the burden: after all, the market gets the service!

It's like here at school. Chancellor-for-life Scott has to pay huge salaries to attract the best leadership for the administration. If he didn't, UMass stock would surely go down and it would be even harder to get into classes. It might take 10 years to graduate rather than 6. They might raise tuition again and I would end up a pan scrubber or a line cook. As a business, UMass must utilize sound management. We owe that much to the corporations that finance our education and provide us with careers. To hell with it. I'm getting polluted tonight. I don't care if I use all my OCMP swipes. Gotta go, free wings at the Old Amazon.com Alehouse...

Friday: Dear Diary:

I've got a hangover from Deerfield to Springfield. I got the spins during History of e-Commerce 290 and had to boot in my trashcan. The e-Commerce class was pretty interesting. One of my email questions was even answered...a first this semester! The e-lecture was about useless education at the college level during the latter 20th century; stuff like comparative literature, foreign languages, cultural diversity, philosophy, apparel marketing (apparel marketing?!!!), etc. What a waste of time. History? What can you do with a BA in History? You can't even get an entry level marketing degree with one of them.

I asked the e-professor: "What were these unnecessary studies designed to teach?"

"These unnecessary classes," she responded, "were thought to instill critical thinking and individuality."

"What would qualities such as those do for someone in the corporate workplace?" I typed.

The e-Prof. answered: "Absolutely nothing."

Thank god we don't have to waste our time with that rubbish. Thank God Chancellor-for-life Scott privatized the Textbook Annex back in '00. Thank God he privatized the Dinning Commons, the departments, and finally the whole school. We don't need poetry or classics. After all, when do you use those on the job? Gotta go, final resumes are right around the corner...

A "Wicked" problem

A n old friend recently forwarded me an email entitled "How To Tell You Are From Massachusetts." It contained a number of humorous, but true, ways that Bay Staters can identify themselves as being from Massachusetts. For example: Number 4: You can navigate a rotary without a problem. Number 10: You know that there was no chance that the Patriots would move to Hartford. Number 21: You think that the rest of the country owes you for having things like Thanksgiving and independence. Number 2: The fact that Routes 128 and 93 are pretty much the same thing doesn't confuse you. Number 8: You know how to pronounce towns like Worcester, Haverhill, and Cotuit. Number 30: You don't recognize the letter "r" as a part of speech.

The list goes on, describing the fact that you can tell a girl from Revere just by her hair, you know the Beanpot is a basket tournament, not a serving container and that you think that Doug Flutie Jr. the greatest athlete ever. However, I believe that this list is missing a few important things. First of all, you can always tell someone is from Massachusetts if they say "wicked." Wicked seems to be a phenomenon from the eighties that somehow just stuck here and has grown into one of the major words in the vocabulary of every kid from Massachusetts. Hearing someone from New York or Ohio say wicked is a nearly impossible occurrence.

Another was to tell you are from Massachusetts is that you have a hard time thinking of the Garden as the Fleet Center and an even harder time calling Great Woods the Tweeter Center. "Selling out" has become a national trend, as stadiums across the country have been renamed after car rental centers and airlines. However, selling out has become especially strong in Massachusetts, as even our state university has begun to sell out its students in the name of budget cuts, privatized stores and businesses, and a loss of academics as the priority of the university.

The student population at UMass, especially the undergraduate population, is the bread and butter, heart and soul, and very reason for the existence of our university. Our tuition and fee money is what puts the food on the table for professors and administrators. We are the reason for thousands of jobs across the Pioneer Valley. Our need and desire for an education is why this university exists; yet for some reason, the administrators of UMass seem to have forgotten that education needs to be priority number one. It is terribly sad that another way to tell you are from Massachusetts is that you attend a university where students are not always put first.

Laura Siciliano

It is understandable that the University will not always get all of the money that they request from the state. However, in a booming economy when UMass receives a 4 percent budget increase, budget cuts to academic departments are intolerable. I agree wholeheartedly that the University needs to be fiscally responsible. However, the university also needs to prioritize. The very reason and mission for this school is academics; therefore, academics should be the last thing to receive budget cuts. Administrative raises and remodeling of buildings needs to come second to classes, library books and journals, and the hiring of new faculty to replace retired professors. Remodeling buildings is still a necessity, but the priority of UMass needs to be academics first and above all. Administrators need to be paid a fair salary; however, if students cannot find classes because of a shortage, more money needs to go towards academics rather than raises.

The privatization of the bookstore is something that the University is planning on doing to save money. Anyplace the university can save money to put towards academics is great; however, the privatization plan is once again showing clear signs of sacrificing the needs of students. For example, a part of the privatization deal with Follett bookstores is to give faculty and staff a 10 percent discount. There is no clear answer as to whether or not the five percent rebate offered through the textbook annex will be maintained. What does this say about faculty who often need every cent they can save as they struggle through school, may be losing the tiny discount they have while faculty and staff will be given a much better deal. Students are once again being placed on the back burner.

Managing a budget is clearly a challenge. Chancellor Scott generally does a fair job of trying to maintain academics, buildings, salaries, and student resources. However the latest developments such as the lack of T.A.s in the Spanish department, the elimination of the consumer studies department, and the budget cuts threaten a startling trend that must be stopped before it spreads. Students need to be the number one priority of the University of Massachusetts. We do not want to know that we are from Massachusetts because we are the state where students receive a lousy public education.

Sholem Aleichem and secular Jewish culture

By Sasha Senderovich
Collegian Staff

Paying tribute to the Jewish creativity, the Yiddish Book Center in Amherst celebrated the peoples' most distinct author, Sholem Aleichem, with a three-day conference last weekend.

Born Sholem Rabinowitz in a small town of Voronkov in 1859, he was once called "the Jew from the Ukraine who taught his people how to laugh." In fact, Sholem Aleichem has been a master of laughter through tears, decorating his bittersweet stories of then contemporary Jewish life with a touch of delicate humor.

The legacy of a writer was brilliantly presented by Seth Wolitz, who holds the Gale Chair of Jewish studies at the University of Texas at Austin, where he is also a professor of French, Slavic and comparative literature. In a series of lectures, Wolitz approached the genius of Sholem Aleichem through a prism of his ability to turn Jewish life into art, and thus to create a new secular Jewish culture.

A special guest, Robert Waife, the great grandson of Sholem Aleichem, attended the conference. Himself an artist, Waife feels that "starting with Sholem Aleichem's immediate readers to the next generations, we hear marvelous stories about how his writings comforted people in the time of duress." Now that Sholem Aleichem's work has become an integral part of the landscape of the Jewish life, Waife estimates his famed great grandfather's legacy in relation to an individual as "something that gives one a feeling of being human."

Important to understanding Sholem Aleichem's talent is his own vision of himself as a writer. "The people's writer, the artist, the poet, is, for his time, for his epoch, a mirror in which the beams of life must be reflected, as the rays of the sun are reflected in a clear stream of water." he wrote about himself. "Therefore I say that there can be no event in life, no tragedy among the people, which does not touch the writer – and really touch him – to the marrow."

One of the shortcomings of the conference, as Pearle-Anne Margalit of the Yiddish Book Center pointed out, was the lack of participation on behalf of college students. While older participants have expressed their gratitude for an opportunity to connect with other people through three days of immersion in their culture, reaching out to young people remains the Center's formidable task. "Real challenge is getting young Jewish students involved in learning about their culture," noted Margalit.

Yet, the characters so brilliantly described by Sholem Aleichem, are not antiquated heroes; on the contrary they are representative of the new trends of Jewish living. Tevye the dairyman – the protagonist of the famous musical and movie Fiddler on the Roof – stands for the urgent need of resolving a conflict between the traditional shtetl (Jewish town) life and the presses of modernity. This conflict is best represented by Tevye's daughters who, one after another, marry without following a traditional matchmaking scheme, but out of love. Love, unimaginable in the Yiddish world, becomes a powerful symbol of individuality that was inconceivable prior to the turn of the century. It is before this emerging sense of individualism that Tevye is forced to bend, and with which he is able to compromise. And while the modern Jewish world has transcended the stresses of arranged marriage, it remains a reality throughout much of the world. And this is where lays the genius of the writer who is able to transcend his own culture and his own time. "Sometimes I have Japanese students comment that Sholem Aleichem is so Japanese in describing issues that still are very much a reality," said Wolitz.

Importance of Sholem Aleichem cannot be underestimated. While he elaborated on many traditional Jewish values, he was not concerned with Judaism as religion. What Sholem Aleichem was concerned with were the Jews as a people. In the period of tremendous transformation of traditional Jewish life, the voice of Sholem Aleichem was the first voice of the secular expression of Jewish-ness, the voice that foreshadowed the modernization of the Jews was simply due to an introduction of aesthetics into the Jewish life, Jews were seduced by art, art as the new manner of expression. Aesthetics and art enabled hellenization that the West has experienced six hundred years earlier. It is aesthetics that destroyed the uniqueness of the Jewish civilization and made Jews a part of now modern Western civilization."

Challenge of hate groups

By Robbie Madwed
Collegian Correspondent

You'll never win. It's impossible. They are louder, stronger, and they know how to twist words better than you can ever imagine. They are chameleons, constantly changing their direction, while keeping their motivations the same. They act for one purpose only, and nothing you can say can sway their opinions. Nothing you can do can make them stop. Or so it seems...

White supremacy groups have, obviously, one purpose: A "racially pure" world. This, of course, means that anyone who is not 100 percent white does not deserve to live there. And they'll make sure you know that. They will thrust their "facts" in your face via the Internet, leaflets, flyers, and even newspaper ads. They have even gone so far as to distribute information outside a synagogue while a Holocaust memorial service was taking place inside.

One such group is the World Church of the Creator (WCOTC), with its Pontifus Maximus Reverend Matt Hale. The WCOTC is not a Christian group. They "believe that our Race is our Religion." They "completely and categorically reject the Judeo-Christian, Democratic, Marxist, Liberal and Feminist values of today, and supplant them with new and basic values, of which race is the foundation."

So now you are saying, "What's the big deal? They aren't hurting anyone. They are just some whackos in East Peoria, Illinois and using the Israeli flag as a doormat." Well, you're somewhat right, but there is more to them than that. There have been shootings in the name of "racial purity," and although the WCOTC "does not believe in violence," they do admit that if they decide to move in on someone's territory and that person fights back, they will kill him. The WCOTC is slowly making its way across the country with numerous post office boxes across the country and many Internet web sites. There have been many articles and television specials in some of the most major magazines and television networks.

The WCOTC is thriving on everything that we are giving them. They love it when people try and debate them, because they know that they will win. The WCOTC, as well as most of the other Supremacy groups, have great gifts for taking lines out of context from the Talmud (a collection of laws) as well as twisting our own words to make us sound like the enemy. They absolutely love to receive "hate mail" threatening letters from people who are trying to tell the groups that they are wrong.

People do not seem to understand that complaining is not going to get them anywhere. In fact, it is merely going to open the writer up to criticism and perhaps violence. By writing threatening letters, as many organizations and individuals have done, the writers show that they are not above the group in any way. They stoop down to their level and even assume so reverse-racism. The writer becomes just as bad as the group.

Of course, I do not in any way mean that we should be totally silent in responding to these horrible groups. Ignorant silence can be deadly. Instead, we should concentrate on ourselves. If we are so strong in our own beliefs, they cannot hurt us with their false words of accusation. It's true, I know from experience.

I have had the opportunity to interview a neo-Nazi. I listened to him as he told me what was wrong with me, wrong with my people, him as he told me what was wrong with me, wrong with my people, him as he told me what he was wrong with me, wrong with my people, and what he would like to do with them. I sat directly across from him as he told me that the Holocaust never happened, something that I know as a third generation Holocaust survivor to be untrue. I shook his hand. I spoke to him as a real person. And it surprised him.

I didn't get angry or upset. I didn't even try and debate him. And he was surprised. He then told me what most groups are cautious to tell people: "Silence is our number one enemy. When people stop nodding us, we lose our purpose, our motivation."

He's right. When we become so confident in our beliefs, no matter what they may be, that no one can hurt us with mere words, the hate groups will lose their purpose. There will be no one left to proselytize. So look at yourself. When you know who you are, where you came from, and most importantly where you are going, no one – not even the worst of all human beings can hurt you.

Edelman speaks of vagina production

By Leah Weiss

She is "a powerful, wise vagina-talking woman."

This is how Rachel Edelman views herself. Others have seen that side of her as well. In fact, she has been deemed "the vagina lady" by many who pass her on the street. This was not always the case, only a little over a year ago she had not really used the word "vagina". It was not until Rachel came to UMass that she was given the opportunity to learn about herself in this way.

The story starts many years ago when Rachel first discovered the theater. She did so through her synagogue – United Synagogue Youth. It was there that she found her love for the stage. She then went to a theater camp, French Woods Festival of the performing arts when she was a sophomore in high school. It was there that Edelman was confronted by her "first identity challenge through theater." After going to the theater camp for several years and performing in over twenty plays, she returned as a counselor during her senior year of high school.

Her theater experiences brought Rachel to realize her love for helping women to find an identity for themselves. In her first semester at the University, Edelman really wanted to be in a play. However, after ten auditions she was not cast in anything. Then, the opportunity arose for her to audition for The Vagina Monologues. The play is based on a book by Eve Ensler who interviewed women of different ages, religions and cultures about one of the most tabooed, yet spoken-about body organ. Rachel got the role of the old Jewish woman (character that she feels keeps following her around). Through this role she realized "the power-potential in society as a woman." Edelman then decided to spread this idea so it can reach other women, and so she became "the vagina lady."

This past Valentine's Day, Edelman brought The Vagina Monologues to the University of Massachusetts campus. The response was amazing – over 750 people came to see the show. Since so many people turned out for the play this year, Edelman has decided that she is going to bring the show back at the same time next year. Through Vagina Monologues, Rachel has discovered a way to incorporate two of her passions: theater and understanding of women's role in society.

Rachel Edelman, a UMass student brought to campus The Vagina Monologues this past February.

Yet, if that alone is not enough, Edelman is a double major in psychology and BDIC in child development through theater in education. What does she plan to do with this? Starting next fall, Edelman will be student teaching in the eighth grade theater class at Amherst Middle School. After that, who knows? Maybe working for Nickelodeon or auditioning in New York.

However, the things that she plans on doing, will definitely involve theater and educating women and men about identity. Right now, Edelman is working on organizing a theater group that will focus on just that – helping people learn about who they are inside, as well as out.

These are not the only things that Edelman is passionate about. Ever since she was a young child, Rachel felt a connection to Judaism. She remembers her fourth birthday when Morah Chanah brought in her accordion and sung "happy birthday" while Rachel sat on an orange chair. This was the community where Edelman found theater.

Now that she is on her own, away from her parents, Edelman is still very active in the Jewish life. Last year, she was the Jewish Residential Area Programmer (JRAPper) for the Southwest residential area, an experience that had helped her meet many Jewish students on campus. This past winter, Edelman participated in the Birthright 2000 trip to Israel. This she feels, was one of the most important journeys in her Jewish life. On this trip, Edelman learned that the whole world is open to explore the power that is there, and anyone can take advantage of it as long as they try. Anybody.

It is clear to all those who have met Rachel that she is very passionate about what she believes in. Her intense zeal can be felt any time she walks into a room.

A UMass student in Mexico: livin' my Jewish Vida Loca

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

CUERNAVACA, MEXICO – Upon being asked to write about my Jewish experience while studying abroad, I cringed. Jewish life in Central Mexico? There is none. And to make things worse, I haven't made any special attempt to keep the Sabbath, nor to conserve my religious identity while here. Frankly, I had just been too busy, learning Spanish, dancing the salsa, and taking trips around the country. All I took with me was a prayer for a the road, a small plaque that my mother gave me, and this is where my Judaism has remained at.

Still, with Mexico being a strongly religious catholic country, my experience here has provided me a lot of curious encounters and interesting conversations. The Mexicans I met, while definitely not politically correct, have treated their Jewish visitor with a mix of tremendous curiosity and ignorance, interest and suspicion.

Upon arriving to Cuernavaca, I met my host family and was led up to my room, an upstairs dwelling that overlooks a lush valley. One thing didn't fit. I found a huge picture of Jesus Christ hung on a cross right above my bed. My host mother asked me if it was okay, and I in turn apologized for being Jewish. She ended up removing the bleeding Christ, exchanging it for a bedside table-lamp and a heavy-framed flower painting.

At my school, I looked for Hillel or at least for a Jewish student group. Some people looked at me strangely, and then suggested that my best shot would be to go to a Jewish home for the aging, the only institution in my town that has anything to do with Judaism whatsoever. I later looked for any Jewish students, and the closest thing I found was a Mormon ex-missionary that, to my surprise, suggested to immediately convert me and "save my soul."

More than anything, being the only Jew around has made me appreciate what Judaism is all about. When people ask me here what Judaism represents, I don't know what to answer. Where do I start from? Should I talk about the holidays, the Kosher laws, or the strong community? Should I mention the Shabbat, the faith that we have? Should I mention the ancient roots, or our sufferings through out the years? Having to explain about my religion, I've realized that Judaism indeed is not just a religion, but also a whole life, a whole history.

I've also come to realize that when it comes to faith, we are really not that different from other religions. I found myself visiting more cathedrals these past three months than in my entire life. Originally, my main reason has been to appreciate the aesthetics and the art that are represented in these institutions, which are some of the most impressive in the world.

Slowly, however, I have also begun to appreciate walking into a mass and listening to the people pray. There is a certain sweet voice, a belief that suggested to me that although we have different traditions, many of the divisions that separate us from other peoples are unnecessary. I remember how my grandmother told me to never go into a church, lest I commit a sin. Now I understand that I can do that and still keep my distinct faith.

I guess I will have to pack the matzas with me, since I will be traveling somewhere between Guatemala and Belize during the Passover Seder, as many of you will dip fingers in wine and bless over bitter herbs. But I don't consider that as necessarily a bad thing. In fact, I see it as a vital part of my spiritual learning.

The upcoming Passover holidays reminds us that sometimes one has to live in a desert for forty years (or in this case, one semester) in order to reach the holy land. Although Cuernavaca, with its lush green gardens and tropical weather, is hardly a desert, being cut off from the Jewish world has taught me that perhaps I need to live outside of the UMass Jewish community for a while in order to learn new things, and then come back and appreciate the old ones even more.

More than Blacks and Jews in conversation

By Renee Cohn
Collegian Staff

"If you realize you're here on a divine mission, everything else falls into place."

This is what Justice Randolph Jackson told the eager listeners on March 30 at the Hillel-sponsored Blacks and Jews: in Conversation. The conversation was a chance for Blacks and Jews to find common footing and address the shared history of hate and bigotry. It was articulated at the meeting that any one minute Blacks and Jews spend arguing with one another is a waste; the two groups share common threads both historically and spiritually and should be working together to stop hatred.

Blacks and Jews: in Conversation has been traveling throughout the country, spreading the message of communication among minority groups. It finally came to UMass, bringing with it Jeffrey Ross, Shannon Taylor and Randolph Jackson.

Jeffrey Ross, from the Anti-Defamation League, served as the program mediator. He began the conversation by telling the history of the organization, as well as some unfortunate instances of bigotry and hate from recent years. Blacks and Jews: In Conversation rose out of the wake of the Thurgood Marshall and the New York Anti-Semitic Crown Heights incidents. Some local New York judges decided that the problem will be permanent if responsible voices don't arise and educate. What began as a program for local New York middle and high school students then branched out to target college students all around the US as well. Since its beginning, the Conversation has become a multi-cultural event addressing the abolishment of all forms of prejudice.

Shannon Taylor served as the Conversation's lewish judge His flamboyance brought laughter to the crowd, but his impassioned sentiments touched the captive listeners. Taylor's list of achievements included time as a program director for Tufts University, an entertainment lawyer and a New York judge.

Thirdly, UMass had the privilege of adding a New York State Supreme Court elected member. Justice Randolph Jackson, to serve as the Conversation's Black judge. Jackson's schedule is arduous, but he found time to make it to New England to participate in this event. Jackson's list of accomplishments was large, as he has been in the National Guard, worked with former President Nixon's law firm, is a published author, and also a judge for the state of New York. Those who attended the discussion at Hillel were both privileged and honored to have such guests.

Jeffrey Ross' opening statements included the retelling of atrocities committed all around the country in recent years, reminding us that these acts of hate are not only in the past. A college student at University of Maryland had repeated vulgar death threats only because he was black; a man named Benjamin Smith has inserts and advertisements for college papers denying the Holocaust – 20 of them have been published this year, in colleges such as Hofstra and Wake Forest.

After introductions from Judge Jackson and Taylor, the conversation shifted to audience questions/discussion. In the course of the forum, known topics such as police brutality, the Crown Heights riots, racial prejudice, affirmative action and Hillary Clinton's relation with the Jewish people were discussed. Even more obscure issues were addressed, such as David Irving, a pending case in Britain of a Holocaust denier (Irving) who is arguing that he is getting a lower readership for his anti-Semitic literature because of the effects of personally directed racism.

It is difficult to enter a dialogue of this sort without triggering strong emotions along with the very sensitive issues. However, Judge Jackson maintained the reason why dialogues such as these are vital: blacks shouldn't be in one corner with Jews in the other corner, without knowing about each other. After all, we are all fighting a common enemy—the same people who hate blacks, hate Jews. Whether it is white supremacy, neo-nazis and the KKK, or mere ignorance and fear, the last place Jews and Blacks should be is on the verbal battleground.

We live on a very large campus, but we become blind to the thousands of people who pass us daily. Our world gets very small, and sometimes it becomes hard to look out and see the common threads that keep us all connected. It's imperative that, if we are ever to stop intolerance, we make every effort to listen to each other as much as possible. Prejudice, injustice and hate crimes cannot exist if we educate ourselves. No matter your age, sex, religion, race or creed, if you turn your backs and pretend it isn't happening to them, who will protect you when it is you who are the victim?

To that end, Hillel has planned a Freedom Seder, April 17th at the top of the Campus Center. This will be a chance for Jews and Blacks to engage in a remembrance of slavery and freedom together. The Jewish Student Union and the Black Student Union will be sponsoring it. Sign up by April 7th, or call 549-1710 for more details. The event will further the themes of the Conversation, as the event recognizes the historical similarities between Blacks and Jews, and the importance of communication.

Chili Peppers "Red Hot" in Mullins

Foo Fighters stir up crowd with set

Red Hot Chili Peppers/ Foo Fighters
Mullins Center
April 2

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Distorted guitar riffs, wailing vocals, intricate bass solos, and shirtless Californians marked Sunday night's sold-out Foo Fighters/Red Hot Chili Peppers double billing.

After Muse played to arena ol people still filing in, Dave Grohl and the Foo Fighters stormed the stage at 7:30 p.m. The newly reformed quartet started out with an old favorite and one of their most pulsating songs, "Monkeywrench" off 1997's Grammy nominated The Colour and the Shape. The familiar chords and high-pitched screaming ignited the crowd. The band's momentum continued with "Learn to Fly," the first single off their latest disc. There is Nothing Left to Lose. From there, Dave Grohl and drummer Taylor Hawkins launched into an amazing drum solo. Grohl joined his band mate at the back of the stage, donned a pair of drumsticks, and both simultaneously pounded out a great, if not abbreviated, percussion set, which served as an introduction to "Hero." Arguably the most popular single off their last album, the song permanently frenzied the crowd.

Crowd surfing ensued for the remainder of the Foo Fighters' set, which was fairly straightforward. Grohl, dressed in all black save a red tie, energetically flailed about the stage for most of the night. His edgy vocals often punctuated songs and choruses with a serious resulting in a slightly less melodic sound than that on their latest album. The band's visual presentation was also fairly basic, mouth flashing lights, the highlight of which was the golden yellow during "This is a Call."

Things slowed down a bit as Grohl did "For all the Cows," off the Foos' debut disc, solo. "Breakout," the second track on Nothing Left to Lose failed to regain the crowd's initial exuberance. Then came another Grohl solo, a decidedly interesting turn with an acoustic version of "Big Me." While the song failed to impress at least one listener to whom I talked, I thought it was wonderful.

Current radio single, "Stacked Actors" was followed by the fairly obscure "Weenie Beenie" off the band's debut album. "I'll Stick Around" was a great intro to "Iserking," my favorite Foo track and their set's highlight. The band closed with "This is a Call," the song that made them famous.

Overall, the Foo Fighters played an energetic, aggressive set. They went through their most popular singles, playing more older material, rather than exclusively promoting Nothing Left to Lose. However, I'd say that the formings and re-formings of the band have affected their stage unity as they often came off as a one-man show.

This was definitely not true for the Red Hot Chili Peppers, whose unity was obvious and a definitive highlight of their set. The California-based band put on a scorching show in support of their new album Californication.

Inside of three songs, all members were shirtless (though Flea later attired himself in a white t-shirt) and with good reason; their set was hot.

After being greeted by a raging crowd, the band launched into the bass-driven "Around the World," appropriately the first song off Californication. If this wasn't enough fuel for a kindling fire, the band next played the blistering cult-hit "Give it

The Red Hot Chili Peppers showed that they still have what it takes to satisfy with their energized Sunday night show at the Mullins Center.

Away" and the crowd went crazy. The first single of Californication, and the simply divine "Scar Tissue" was next. Here, lead singer, Anthony Kleidis, and guitarist John Frusciante harmonized well, crooning over the moody chorus. The guitar chords were slightly subdued in favor of a bass-heavy version, but nonetheless, there is no was they were going to mess up this masterpiece.

Here, where the Foo fighters lost some momentum, the Chili Peppers kept on cooking. "Suck my Kiss," the slam-rock anthem also off 1991's Blood Sugar Sex Magik was up next. Then came one of the many musical jams on the night. Kleidis took a seat atop a large speaker and let bassist, Flea, and Frusciante do an unbelievable bass/guitar session. The duo started off with short, abbreviated chords, eventually working themselves into an endless barrage of seamless notes. Soon thereafter, the band rocked into current radio smash "Other Side."

Apart from their musical intensity, the band's sexual performance was more colorful. The band used playback video footage and television screens for an additional flair. Among the video highlights were the setting desert skies during "Me and My Friends" (the next song in their wonderful set), the screaming New York cityscape during "I like Dirt," and the bizarre, pinkish anime during "Get on Top."

The Chili Peppers then played what could be called the Californication part of their set, starting off with "Easily." Psychedelic, spinning video footage accom-

The Nields release latest folk-rock gem full of surprises

The Nields
If You Lived Here You'd be Home Now
Zoe Records

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Anyone who's familiar with the colorful Northampton music scene has undoubtedly heard about the Nields, the local folk-rock outfit which is slowly but surely gaining national recognition. The Nields have used a foundation of grassroots enthusiasm and a rabidly devoted fan base to establish themselves as a cornerstone of the east coast folk community, and their most recent album, If You Lived Here You'd Be Home Now, is a testament to their continued investment in merging acoustic music with 60s pop influences and a completely unique flair for lyrical storytelling.

Whereas past albums could best be described as nicely recorded renditions of their live performances, If You Lived Here... takes full advantage of the studio environment to create finely textured and layered pieces which, although they may not translate as easily into a live setting, bring the band's music to new levels of maturity and thoughtfulness. The first track, "Jeremy Newborn Street," for instance, contains a charming recorder solo, melting into a swingy New Orleans-style horn section break, all held together by a piano and a minimum of guitar interference.

The Nields are headed by the sister-sister-husband team of Kartryna Nields, Nerissa Nields, and David Nields (he took Nerissa's name). Although Katryna generally takes the role of lead singer, Nerissa does a fine job as backing vocalist, occasionally taking the spotlight, and the sisters achieve some stunningly beautiful harmonies. Nerissa and David share guitar and songwriting duties, and stories of individual ambition and devotion weighed against external forces form the lyrical backbone of the album.

Bassist David Chalfant also takes the role of lead producer, engineer, and mixer (and occasional dobrolst and slide guitarist), and David Hower completes the lineup as one of the most energetic drummers currently involved in folk music.

If You Lived Here..., contains an effective mix of playful, Beatlesesque pop tunes and softer, more emotionally dense songs, such as "Maybe It's Love," which features a string quartet backed only by a single, skeletal acoustic guitar. The album also swings further to the folk side of their influences than any previous offering, with an instrumentally spartan and heart wrenching cover of Hank Williams's "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," and the enthusiastic gospel-tinged tune "Keys to the Kingdom."

Some of the tracks do come across as unnecessary, however; the 55-second "Poem," a sarcastic examination of the Barbi doll, sounds like a bad feminist's joke, and "Forever" has David Nields struggling awkwardly with the role of lead singer. These two blemishes, however, are only minor distractions from an otherwise consistently pleasing album.

The Nields invited a great many guest musicians into the studio, and the liner notes read like a who's-who of contemporary folk music: Ben Demerath; the Kennedys; Dar Williams; Moxy Fruvous; Jump, Little Children; and Rani Arbo, just to name the big ones. The additional musical muscle these names bring to the table, along with the Nields' strongest songwriting to date, make If You Lived Here You'd Be Home Now a delightful collection of 14 potential new favorite songs. B+

Travis's newest release ripe with brit-pop style

Travis
The Man Who Epic

One look at the top selling albums in the US for 1999 is enough to drive many a music fan to tears: Britney Spears, Backstreet Boys, Kid Rock, is it possible to feel pride looking at the success of any of these individuals? Aren't you just glad that such talented people finally had some success after their unending dedication to music and all it can be? Sigh. At least across the Atlantic the #1 selling album of 1999 can be looked upon with admiration and respect. The top spot in the UK belonged to Scottish quartet Travis and their sophomore effort The Man Who. An intensely emotional trek through ten songs (plus one) filled with joy and sadness, The Man Who is simply a brilliant album that displays the kind of thoughtful pop that doesn't have a chance in hell of making any kind of dent in the US charts.

The four corners of Travis are singer/songwriter Fran Healy, guitarist Andy Dunlop, bassist Dougie Payne, and Neil Primrose on drums. Their only previous release was their debut record Good Feeling, which spawned a number of successful singles overseas as well as the slight prominence of "All I Wanna Do Is Rock" stateside. The strength of their live performance landed them a spot on a number of high-profile tours including the Oasis Be Here Now tour which breezed through the US with frustratingly few dates. The band will

Bush rocks out Rhody

Robbin Goodridge, Bush's drummer uses size 9B "ahead" black drumsticks. The reason I know this is because I am holding the stick that he used Friday night to turn a gym at Providence College into a hard rocking heaven, in my right hand.

Bush headlined the Campus Invasion tour, which has been making its way around the country for the past few weeks. The tour, which includes techno-supersize Moby, is sponsored by MTV, and has a purpose of entertaining college students in a small club atmosphere. The atmosphere was by far the most enjoyable part of the show. After seeing Bush twice in the past, I have come to expect a crowd full of screaming teenage girls lusting for a chance to touch their God, Gavin Rossdale. It was slightly different in the case of the Providence College show, because the audience was generally filled with twenty-year-old attractive women.

Bush, a British rock band that first had success in the United States in 1995 with Sixteen Stone is on tour in support of their new album The Science of Things. This was very evident in the amount of merchandise that could be purchased with the title of the CD plastered all over everything. However, the concert was not dominated by selections from the new album.

Bush truly used the five-song encore to shine. After about five minutes of screaming, Gavin hit the stage by himself to play the first half of the band's biggest hit to date, "Glycerine." In the middle of "Glycerine" the rest of the band returned, and continued the night with "Swallowed," "Ex-Girlfriend," and "Prizefighter." As they have for almost every show they have ever played, Bush closed the night with the heavy "Little Things" from Sixteen Stone. The only new twist on the song was that Rossdale did not use his guitar. Instead he traveled around the stage with a wireless microphone, leading the crowd in a sing-a-long of one of their biggest hits.

The night culminated with Goodrige throwing both drumsticks into the crowd, I now own one of them.

A communal and spiritual atmosphere was created as "My Weakness" played while Moby's supporting band; a bassist, DJ, and live drummer, took the stage. When Moby himself appeared, he need only jump to the beat of opener "Machinehead" to get the crowd moving. The crowd was very responsive throughout the electronica guru's hour-long set; dancing, cheering, and even chanting his name, which Moby addressed by adding "they're either chanting 'go away' or 'Moby.'" The new album Play was well-represented with an upbeat version of "Honey," new single "Natural Blues," and of course the banging "Bodyrock," which was preceded by a little of Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Sweet Home Alabama." Throughout, Moby jumped about and was his usual likeable self, interacting with the crowd and the band, even allowing the DJ to give a short display of his considerable skills.

Jack-of-all-trades that he is, Moby was all over the place, either singing, strumming on a guitar, drumming, on keyboards, or squeezing powers out of "Lucifer's tambourine." Some old favorites proved to be a hit with the crowd as well, like his bouncy, percussion-heavy remix of the James Bond theme, old faithful "Go," and the feel-good "Bring Back My Happiness." Moby's wonderful set ended with the unabashedly smiley "Feeling So Real," which Moby called one of the best disco songs he'd ever made, and that people who "don't have the heart and soul to love disco can go fuck themselves." When it's as creative and uplifting as Moby's performance, I totally agree.

Paired together, Bush and Moby made the MTV Campus Invasion tour one of the most entertaining shows in years. It was very nice to be able to see two bands that should be playing stadiums in such a comfortable atmosphere. Collegian Music Editor Michael Delano contributed information about Moby to this article.

San Jose Taiko festival comes to FAC

San Jose Taiko
Japanese Drums, Dance & Music
FAC Concert Hall
March 26 2000

By Emily Vacanti
Collegian Staff

San Jose Taiko was a performance in which instead of using words, the performers used drums, gongs and a flute. The group played 15 different songs/stories, with different cultures and feelings represented through carefully choreographed sound.

Throughout the whole show, the performers never stopped smiling and they never missed a single beat. The movements were crisp, fluid and untouchable. I couldn't believe their speed and accuracy. They changed their beats on a regular basis, and yet they never missed a beat.

Penelope Dane, a graduate sociology student, told me exactly what she thought of the show: it took her a few minutes, however, to put it into words because the show was so well done. "It was better than I ever possibly could have imagined," Dane said. "My hands hurt because I clapped so hard." The clapping was almost indeed almost too loud to bear, while the wolf whistles only intensified the reaction. There were seven performers, and they all did an amazing job.

Each song/story had a different set of beats. The beats for each story changed regularly. Each beat was intricately performed with such perfection that your jaw dropped.

After the show I was able to speak with the two performers who ran the show, PJ and Roy Hirabayashi. My first question was how long they had been doing drum performances for, and their answer of 27 years amazed me. By looking at their physical appearance, I wouldn't have guessed them to be any older than 35. I will not state their age without their permission, but I will say that they looked much younger than they were.

Next I asked them how much training and preparation it took to put together and perform this show. This is one of the many aspects of their show that makes it different from many of the other shows performed at UMass. Their show was a cross-section of new and old material. Some of their material was from 27 years ago, while some was brand new, less than a year old. All of the material that they performed went together beautifully, like a hand fits in a glove.

What I was also very curious about was whether the performance was both as hard and fun as it looked. They both answered by saying, "We enjoy what we are doing." It is a correlation of festivity and celebration. But they did admit that it was, and continues to be, very hard work.

My third question concerns when they performed the majority of their drumming shows. Their answer was at mainly community festivals. Most of the time they perform in the summer. Some of their performances are at Obon Festivals, which are Buddhist summer festivals.

Next I asked if the drumming is traditionally mainly women, or if this is a relatively new style. They responded by saying that women are not the traditional performers. Something that they said that I find interesting is that the group ensemble is relatively new. The group ensemble was started within the last 40 years.

I also wanted to know if everyone had their own drumsticks, or if they shared them, and how the drumsticks come about. Each performer has his/her own drumsticks and they either buy them or make them. They generally make them because every kind of wood has a different sound and texture, and therefore works differently with the different drums. The sticks are very diverse.

PJ made a comment that I found very interesting: she said that occupy the pre-Oasis spot once again however, during the US dates for the tour in support of Standing On the Shoulder of Giants, a bill in which a lack of tickets on your part suggests something seriously wrong.

"Writing To Reach You" gets things off to a start that is almost worthy of comparison to the Stone Roses' "I Wanna Be Adored" in terms of building excitement and anticipation for the remainder of the album. Healy's voice is full of yearning but not without a sense of humor, as he sings "the radio is playing all the usual, and what's a Wonderwall anyways?," the first of a few pop culture references on the album. The beautiful chorus will be ingrained in your mind for quite a while, and you can't help but get the feeling you have stumbled across something special. But if you just love catchy pop songs and not Healy's vocals, the next two songs may be tough, as they are much more personal songs without feel-good choruses and Healy's vocals are definitely the driving force behind both tunes.

When "Driftwood" makes its way to your ears, though, it's simply pop magic at its finest. The same goes for "The Last Laugh of the Laughter," which contains some verses in French and the disc's second most bittersweet chorus. The first is certainly "Why Does It Always Rain on Me?," which in my opinion is as monumental a single as "Wonderwall." The somber violin in the beginning sets a terribly dreary tone, only to be lightened a little by some cheery acoustics and finally light shines through with Healy's chorus where he asks the question in the title not as a complaint but as a joyful acceptance of his bad luck. If you weren't depressed enough by the last track, the opening of "Luv" starts off with some soul-wrenching harmonica that reduces the most hardy of fellows into a whimpering pool of sentimentality. "Slide Show" manages to name-drop Beck and Oasis once again, and hidden track "Blue Flashing Light" showcases a much more raw and rocking side of Travis complete with Healy's most forceful vocals backed by some Bond-sounding riffs.

Of course, I hope I am wrong about Travis' US impact and every single enjoys a long and deserved life at the top of the charts. After all, we did embrace "Wonderwall" in what now seems like an ancient music scene. Travis are undoubtedly at a very exciting point in their career at the moment, enjoying a solid second album that has brought them a Morning Glory-style media blitz in the UK. The Man Who is willing and eager to please, doesn't rest on any previous success, and certainly doesn't create an atmosphere that would suit a song title like "Where Did It All Go Wrong?" Buy the album, buy the singles, and my obvious advice for Oasis concertgoers (because I know you have tickets): get there early. A passed the song about disillusionment. After a brief, and rather amusing "Minuteman Tribute," which involved Flea selling a lot, the band played the raucous "I like Dirt," off Californication followed by the magnificent title track.

The Led Zepplin cover, "Save My Soul," led to some interesting Kleidis banter before "Get on Top" also off Californication. They closed their initial set with an unbelievable solo rendition of "Under the Bridge" by Frusiante, whose warming vocals surprised many.

"Soul to Squeeze," the breakthrough hit off Sex Magik, was left for the encore, at which point the fans were ravenous for more of the band. An unnamed song (possibly "Burn Baby, Burn") was left for last. Eventually the blistering song dwindled into a fusion distortion and feedback, but it didn't matter by that point. The Chili Peppers had left their mark. They left a sold-out crowd and myself rock-crazed and wanting more.

Buddhists thought that the drumstick connects heaven and human to the spirit of the drum and to nature. It's one continuous line of connections.

I was intrigued by their choice of costume. PJ and Roy explained that they chose this costume as their 25th Anniversary costume. There were four different colors, which looked beautiful together: purple, green, black and red. The red was only in the maple leaf, which was a symbol that helped to define them. Amazingly, they make all of the clothes that they wear. The shoes that were worn during the performance are called "Tabi". They're soft-soled and move with you.

Their goal in doing this performance was to erase the boundary between the audience and the performer. PJ and Roy want the audience and performer to be one.

Their final comment, shared between them, is that "Taiko is becoming more and more diverse in North America. It is our hope through time for each group to create their own style."

Individual style is something that they achieve very clearly. They do an excellent job performing something you have never seen before. Their style is individual, amazing and beautiful. My only wish is that they will return to share what they have achieved with more of UMass and the rest of the five-college community; San Jose Taiko was that amazing.

onds separated the first place A team and the Huskies. The Minutewomen also placed second with the B team, leaving a wake in Connecticut's path with six seconds separating the two. The Minutewomen's only loss came in the varsity four, as UConn cruised past them, winning the race by just under 13 seconds. Massachusetts edged out the Huskies B team to take home second place with a solid nine-point advantage. Connecticut split its Varsity eight boat to compete in the Varsity Four.

UMass has now improved to 3-1 on the season. The team is in action next at the Kenecht Cup Regatta, on Saturday April 8.

loss to Jensen Bascome, 6-4, 6-1.

In doubles action, the duos of Prisco and Navarro, Samii and Shaw, and senior Marco Casesa and Champeau were all defeated.

On Sunday, the racket-wielding Minutemen headed for Villanova, where they suffered a 5-2 loss.

In No. 1 singles, Prisco faced yet another menacing opponent, losing to Villanova's Robert Waibel, 6-3, 6-4.

"Steve's been losing in straight sets lately," Wilkins said. "He just needs to turn that corner, take it to three sets, and push the guy a little. Every team in Division I has an excellent No. 1 player, and Steve's had a battle in every match."

Rabanal lost to Mike Mock, 6-3, 7-5, in the No. 2 slot, while Navarro took Josh Schofield to three sets before bowing out, 6-3, 0-6, 6-4. In the No. 4 slot, Samii was victorious against Paul Moore, winning handily in straight sets, 6-3, 6-3.

No. 5 singles player Shaw surrendered to Ryan Divine is straight sets, 6-3, 6-3, and Champeau emerged as the victor in a three-set dogfight versus A. J. Rohde, 6-3, 3-6, 7-5.

Prisco and Navarro paired at No. 1 doubles to defeat the tandemm of Waibel and Schofield, 8-5. Meanwhile, Samii and Shaw lost in the No. 2 slot, while Champeau and Casesa met a similar fate in No. 3 doubles action.

"Villanova was a beatable team and we just didn't get it done," Wilkins said regrettably. "The positive side is that the effort's still there. People are still trying. Hopefully, there will be light at the end of the tunnel."

The weekend that was: UMass sports roundup

Morency qualifies for NCAAs in season opener

Senior Vic Morency wasted little time in making his presence known nationally.

Although no team scores were kept in last weekend's Princeton Invitational, the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team began the 2000 campaign with moderate success, led by Morency's astounding heaves. His throw of 225' 1 1/2" in the javelin not only placed him first in the competition, but also made him eligible for the NCAA Championships held later this season.

Even while falling four feet short of his school record set last season (229' 7"), the competition proved to be merely an afterthought, as the second-place finisher fell 11 feet short of Morency's mark.

In addition to the strongman's achievement, the Minutemen also got solid performances from his teammates. Freshman Stefan Russ placed second in the high jump with a leap of 6' 5" while junior Brendan Sullivan came in second in the steeplechase, finishing with a time of 9:18.8.

Senior Ben Baraldi started his fast run through at UMass with a stellar all-around afternoon. The Longmeadow native's time of 56.45 was good for fifth in the 400m hurdles while landing the bronze in the 110m high hurdles, running the event in 14.1 seconds.

Next Saturday, the Minutemen will take on four other squads when they travel to UConn.

Freshman makes immediate impact at Dartmouth

Easy transition.

Freshman Maggie Curry came east to UMass from her Mukwonago, WI home and head coach Julie LaFreniere can already see into the future with a smile on her face. That's because the newcomer's throw of 135' 7 1/2" in last weekend's discus competition was good for third in the UMass record books.

Despite Curry's success, the Minutewomen finished last at Dartmouth College, trailing New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine and the event's host at dat's end.

Sophomore Kate Toye and junior Chrystal Murphy both placed second in their respective events. Toye rambled to the silver in the 100m dash, finishing in 12.47 seconds while Murphy's time of 14.80 seconds in the 100m high hurdles was plenty to make the podium.

Seniors Alison Tostevin and Sharon Hutchinson landed bronzes, Tostevin tossing a career-best 41' 11 1/4" in the shot put. That placed her fourth in school history. Meanwhile, Hutchinson ran the 3000m in 10:18.54.

The Minutewomen will take Medford up on its invitation, heading to the Tufts Invitational on Saturday for the mid-morning start.

Next Saturday, the Minutemen

Women's tennis falls despite Lebovitz sweep

The sport can be regarded as an individual battle of sorts, but the Massachusetts women's tennis squad has learned the importance of pants in the 2000 spring season.

Sophomore captain Robyn Lebovitz whacked her way to wins in both singles and doubles, but the Minutewomen fell to 1-7 this spring and 4-12 overall by dropping a 5-4 decision to Temple this past weekend in Amherst. It was the Minutewomen's fourth loss in as many matches, much due to a depleted lineup from the beginning of the season.

Lebovitz, however, did her best to keep the Maroon and White in it. At the fifth spot in singles, the Marietta, GA native bounced back from a second set stumble by routing the Owls' Nina Kumar 6-0 in the final frame. She then paired up with Katie Stammen at No. 2 doubles for an 8-6 victory.

UMass suffered innumerals at the top singles spots, as Temple took three of the top four, with the exception coming at the three spot with Annie Hamilton's 7-6, 6-2 win over Tanja Zecic. Top-seed Ola Gerasimova relinquished a one-set lead, falling to TL's Tamara Truta 2-6, 7-6, 6-0.

The tandem of Helena Horak and Michelle Kuhr took home the team's other victory, coming at No. 3 singles with an 8-6 triumph.

Judy Dixon and company will try to put an end to their slump when taking on Seton Hall Thursday in NJ.

Football adds three to coaching staff

A few days after landing Notre Dame linebacker Joe Ferrer, the Massachusetts football team rected in a trio of assistants to help the Minutemen to the playoffs for a third consecutive season.

Head coach Mark Whipple announced three additions to his staff for the 2000 season. Detrick Arnold and Matt Cassano were named as graduate assistants, while Joe VanDetta took the fold as the new video coordinator.

Arnold will work with defensive coordinator Don Brown, leaving his alma mater, Salisbury State, after a season at the helm of the wide receivers and tight ends. Cassano comes over from New Hampshire after completing his senior season with the Wildcats. He comes to Amherst to aid recruiting coordinator and offensive line coach Paul Gorham. He joins his brother Mike on the staff, who serves as the squad's running back coach.

VanDetta comes over from Purdue stepping up to become the video boadman after being the assistant coordinator with the Boilermakers. While in West Lafayette, VanDetta handled videotaping of games and practices also helping with video editing and breakdown.

more honors than any other gymnast in UMass history.

So their season is now finished, and it has been great to say the least. Last year they went to Regionals, this year to NCAAs for the first time, and with some of the recruits they've signed for next year, there's no telling how far they'll go in the future.

UMass second to Princeton again

Minutewomen destroy field, still unable to solve Tigers

By Adam White

Claudia Clement would like the rest of the collegiate water polo world to kindly get the hell out her way.

The senior co-captain brought the waters of Princeton's Denunzio Pool to a boil this weekend, racking up 11 goals to propel No. 11 Massachusetts into the Eastern College Athletic Conference Championship final. After defeating Villanova 8-6 and Harvard 10-4 on Saturday, the Minutewomen hit the water Sunday and routed Queens 10-1 before falling to the host Tigers 8-5 in the title game.

"This weekend was definitely a test of our concentration," Clement said. "I'm not too worried about losing to Princeton, because we usually have the ability to bounce back and learn from our mistakes."

The loss marks the second suffered by UMass (21-6 overall, 9-0 Collegiate Water Polo Association) at the hands of Princeton this season.

Sunday's championship saw Coach Dan McOsker's troops locked in a true see-saw battle with their fiercest East Coast rival, a game for which the team concentrated on playing its absolute best brand of polo.

"Since we got back from California [during the third week of March] we've focused on how well we played out there, particularly against Davis," said senior field player Laurie Anderson. "On Thursday, after practice, we watched film of that game and tried to pinpoint how we played, and how to get back to that point against Princeton."

With senior All-American Katie Grogan denting the Tiger net twice and Anderson, Marci Hupp and Kelly Chassy all connecting for UMass, the offense was certainly there in the final. The problem for the Maroon and White became stopping Princeton, which seemed to answer each of UMass' attacks with scoring punch of its own.

After falling behind 3-1 over the first seven minutes of the fray, the Minutewomen put up a pair of goals in the second quarter and appeared to have gotten on track. But the Tigers answered with their own pair of scores, pushing their lead to 5-3 at halftime.

McOsker's crew roared back in the third set with three unanswered tallies to lock the game at five-all, but was forced to watch helplessly as Princeton put home the last three goals of the game to coast to victory.

"Usually I'm more of a defensive player, so I'd rather come out of a game feeling good about my defense," Clement said. "It sucks to score a goal and not feel good about it because they come right back and answer every time."

The semifinal earlier Sunday pitted UMass against Queens College, which unfolded in a lopsided affair with nine different Minutewomen scoring. Clement paced the Maroon and White with four of its 12 goals, with Gwynn Chassy, Amy Black, Lizzy Bonk, Anne Dettloff, Sarah Newell, Megan Perry and Megan Thompson spelling the rest of UMass' offensive onslaught.

"The Queens game gave us an opportunity to get some more people in and get them some playing time," Clement said.

The Minutewomen improved to 3-0 all-time versus Queens with the win.

UMass opened Saturday's round-robin action by facing off with Villanova, a program that had never beaten the Minutewomen in five previous meetings. That total increased to six, as another four-goal barrage from Clement helped push UMass to victory in a game that was essentially closer than it should have been.

"To say that we came out flat is a definite understatement," Clement said. "Luckily, it was at the beginning of the tournament and we were able to get our act together before it really cost us."

> "When we come out for Easterns, we'll come out ready to blow everybody out of the water."
> - Laurie Anderson

The two teams went goal-for-goal for the entire 28 minutes of regulation, prompting an overtime situation and gut-check time for the Maroon and White.

"We basically said 'we're starting over now'," Hupp said. "We knew that we should've been winning the whole game, but now with two 3-minute quarters left, it was time to go."

The Cats simply couldn't stay afloat in the extra set, as a pair of UMass goals put Nova away for good.

The Harvard game later Saturday gave Edwards and company a chance to bounce back from their sub-par showing in the tourney opener, which they did in style with a six-goal first quarter explosion. Hat tricks by Clement and Hupp helped knock out the Crimson early, while eight more saves by Sinkwich helped the Maroon and White return to its top-shelf form.

Anderson viewed the weekend's ultimate result as being positive for the team come the Eastern Championship Tournament. "These two losses to Princeton, we've let them dictate the game both offensively and defensively," said Anderson. "When we come out for Easterns, we'll come out ready to blow everybody out of the water."

Men's gym places twelfth at NCAA competition

UMass displays its skills with nation's best

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

IOWA CITY, IA – After a long and exciting year, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team closed out its season last weekend with a twelfth place finish at its first appearance at NCAAs.

After winning the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championships a few weeks ago, the Minutemen advanced to the qualifying portion of the NCAA National Championships held last Thursday night. And although UMass put its best foot forward, the stiff competition kept the Maroon and White out of the team finals, ending its season with a final team score of 222.15. The University of Michigan came in first at the meet with a high 231.925.

Despite the fact that the Minutemen as a team didn't manage to advance to the next day of competition, there were, like always, some standout performances by a number of individuals – some of those performances earning the athletes spots at the individual competition.

Having some trouble on the pommel horse, senior Jeff LaVallee finished tenth in the all-around (55.65) and was unfortunately kept out of the finals. But the stellar athlete maintained his concentration and managed to advance into the NCAA Championship individual rounds on three individual events: floor (9.525), parallel bars (9.70) and high bar (9.55). LaVallee was also honored as the 2000 Nissen-Emery Award recipient. The Helsman Trophy of gymnastics, the Nissen-Emery Award is presented each year to the nation's most outstanding senior collegiate gymnast. LaVallee is the first UMass gymnast to receive such a prestigious honor.

Also among the great performers in the qualifier, junior Andy Leis and freshman Justin Hammar advanced to the next day on the pommel horse. Leis placed 13th overall (9.625), while Hammar tied his teammate Brian Peterson for 14th (9.60). Despite a great floor routine with his trademark three and one-half twisting somersault, junior Bryan McNulty didn't advance to the next day on his best event. But the Springfield, VA native managed to come through with an 8th place finish on vault (9.50), earning him a spot at the next day's competition in the end.

Also helping out his team was UMass junior Clayton Kent. Kent tumbled his way to a 9.35 on floor, and put up respectable 9.40s on the vault and still rings as well. And last but certainly not least, freshman Ben Jacobs swung his way to a career-high 9.35 on the high bar, the second highest score posted by the Minutemen.

Even though they were somewhat disappointed because they didn't advance to finals as a team, the Minutemen were fairly happy with the result of the meet and remain optimistic about future appearances at NCAAs.

"I think we did pretty well," said head coach Ros Johnson. "We came pretty close to our season average. This meet is a really good stepping stone for us and hopefully seeing the performances of the other teams will get the guys to take it up a notch [in the future]."

LaVallee, Leis, Hamntar and McNulty – the only four qualifiers from UMass – had nothing to be disappointed about. However, despite the very stiff competition against them, the Minutemen made their presence known. Leis placed 25th on pommel horse with a 9.625, while Hammar placed 42nd with a 9.075. McNulty tied for 29th on vault with a 9.45, and LaVallee tied for 10th on high bar (9.7251 and 22nd on floor (9.625). LaVallee also tied for eighth on the parallel bars (9.775), advancing him to Saturday's individual event finals.

At the third and final day of competition, LaVallee placed fourth on p-bars with a 9.70 to earn the fifth All-America honor of his collegiate career. Last year, the 2000 Olympic Hopeful took All-American in the all-around, floor, vault and still rings, and to date, has earned

Women's gym's Mosby ends career at regionals

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

STATE COLLEGE, PA – The final chapter in the storied career of Massachusetts gymnast Mandy Mosby was written on Saturday night at Penn State University.

The Lilburn, GA native was the lone representative for the Minutewomen at the NCAA Region 5 Championships, as she was one of six individuals who had qualified for the event. Squads from Penn State, Michigan, Florida, New Hampshire, Rutgers and Pittsburgh also competed in the team portion of the meet.

Mosby finished the night with a score of 38.225, posting her best mark on the floor exercises (9.725). However, her final tally was not enough to allow her to advance to the National Championships in Boise, ID later this month.

The two-time Atlantic 10 Gymnast of the Year had a solid showing, but encountered some problems on the balance beam that ended up costing her a shot at nationals.

"I can say that I was pleased with my performance. Obviously I was disappointed with my beam dismount" Mosby said. "But I did the best that I could and came back strong after the beam."

Added UMass women's gymnastics coach Dave Kuzara, "Mandy had a very strong start on the beam, and it was flawless until her dismount. It was disappointing because I really thought that she had a chance to win the event and go to NCAAs. I was really pleased with the way that she ended up though, she finished very strong."

Saturday's performance was an unfortunate ending to a magnificent career in Amherst. Mosby emerged on the scene as a freshman to win the A-10 Rookie of the Year award, then followed that up by winning the A-10 Gymnast of the Year award as a sophomore and junior.

"She's meant so much to the team...This year she really put her heart and soul into it," Kuzara said. "It's going to be a strange feeling next year without her. The past four years have gone by so fast."

Said Mosby: "It really hasn't hit me yet that my college career is over. This has been something that I've been doing my whole life."

The senior opened the night with a 9.625 on the bars, then followed that up with a 9.550 on the beam. The score could have been much higher had it not been for the trouble on the dismount.

Determined to finish strong, however, Mosby bounced right back with a 9.725 on the floor exercises. She then completed her collegiate career with a 9.525 on the vault.

For now, Mosby plans on finishing her degree and taking a little break before considering her future in gymnastics.

"I never really liked coaching, but I'd really like to stay involved with the sport, even if it's just judging," she said.

Softball travels to CCSU for tuneup

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Not to look ahead, but it is quite possible that today's 3 p.m. double-header at Central Connecticut could be a tune-up for the Massachusetts softball team.

That's not necessarily a knock on the Blue Devils, whom the Minutewomen (12-17) crushed last year at home, 7-0, 8-0, but rather a testament to the program that UMass must play this Saturday Virginia Tech.

Last May, UMass defeated the Hokies in both games of a double-header to clinch the Atlantic 10 regular-season crown. And while that date may be in the back of the Minutewomen's minds, their coach feels that today's twin bill belongs in the front, especially for momentum purposes.

Especially for a team of nine underclassmen, eight of whom play regularly.

"The whole bulk of our team is underclassmen. It's hard because they're so young. But they're really starting to develop their character, and they're starting to find out who they are," said coach Elaine Sortino, who hinted that she need not mention VT. "That's really important, especially as we go into Central Connecticut on Tuesday because we open up you-know-where against you-know-who (on Saturday). And that ain't gonna be easy."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Kaila Holtz

UMass leads the all-time series against Central Connecticut, 39-5, since its inception in 1976. While last season's double drubbing was certainly indicative of the overall Minutewoman dominance in the series, this UMass squad is admittedly different than the one of year's past.

It hasn't the luxury of riding any of the pitching laurels it did during the Danielle Henderson era. Henderson actually tied a career-high (and school-high) mark of 18 strikeouts in the opening game of the double-header against the Blue Devils last spring.

Add that to the fact that most of the Minutewomen just haven't played many collegiate games, and one might begin to slow the speedy preconceived assumptions about today's outcome.

Doing much of the damage from the UMass batter's box is the noticeably improved sophomore class, notably center fielder Teri Rooney, who has quietly become the steadiest hitter on the roster. While making the smooth transition from first to third base, second-year standout Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler unleashed a mighty hometown in the most recent Minutewoman contest.

During a 7-4 win over Syracuse last Sunday at home, Wheeler smacked a line drive over the left field fence, nearly reaching the scoreboard. She had a total of three hits in the game.

Sophomores Ashley Bakken and Jen Hadley have also played well at second base and on the mound, respectively. Sortino said she wasn't surprised by the noticeable improvement among the second-year players.

"I think the greatest growth year is between the freshman and sophomore year," she said. "That's usually when the player has their big jump."

Despite an unpromising start to the season, the UMass pitching staff seemed to remedy some of its problem before opening at home last weekend.

Perhaps most crucial to the Minutewoman pitching puzzle is the emergence of a top pitcher: freshman Kaila Holtz. The Vancouver, B.C. native has taken everyone by surprise, except, of course, her coach.

"Kaila is not even at 50 percent of her potential yet," Sortino said, perhaps warning future opponents.

Scary thought. The 4.0 academic ace pitched two complete games last weekend, winning both and allowing only one earned run. In her second time out, the better out the two outings. Holtz pitched a one-hit, shut-out.

The other pitcher of record last weekend was junior Carrie Jeffries, who picked up the loss Saturday in game two against Princeton. Although she allowed five Tigers to cross the plate in the last inning of the UMass loss, Jeffries pitched well the following day against Syracuse, going the distance in the 7-4 Minutewomen win.

No relief for UMass baseball

O'Connell's two hits not enough in Ohio

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Taking three wins from any team is never easy.

Yesterday, the Massachusetts' baseball team came to the aforementioned realization when they dropped the final game of their three-game series with the Dayton Flyers, 4-3.

Knotted at 3-3 in the bottom of the eighth inning, Dayton right fielder Brent Berigan drilled a two-out single off of UMass reliever Nick Skirkanich, to drive in the winning run and prevent a Minutemen sweep. After winning their first two games against Dayton on Saturday, the Minutemen had to wait a day before playing the final game of the series due to inclement weather. The postponement proved to be a hindrance for UMass as 119 Flyer fans watched their team improve to 8-18 overall on a cloudy, drizzly day in Ohio.

With the loss, the Minutemen drop to 10-9 overall and 2-1 in the Atlantic 10. Dayton bolted out to grab an early lead in the first inning but would falter three innings later to see UMass tie the game in the top of the fourth frame. Sophoinore Chris Morgan lined his sixth double of the season before senior Kevin O'Connell plated Morgan with a single. Dayton scored on run in the bottom half of the fifth frame but remained quiet in the following innings as the Minutemen strung together a 3-2 lead by scoring a run in both the sixth and seventh innings. Junior Nick Gorneault walked to start the sixth and O'Connell followed with a sacrifice fly that brought Gorneault home. Sophomore Scott Anderson lined a single to left-center field to lead off the seventh and easily took third on a throwing error by the Flyer hurler Kasey Rosendahl. Gavin Clark then hit a lively grounder to second base that scored Anderson, giving the Minutemen a one-run lead going into the eighth inning.

With UD trailing 3-2, Senior Nate Winkelfoos singled with one out and stole second later in the inning. Sophomore Dan Hoying walked and senior Mark Schulte followed with a singled to plate Winkelfoos and tie the game. Up until this inning, starter Craig Szado stood strong on the hill for UMass but needed relief from Skirkanich with two outs in the frame. Dayton's Bret Berigan immediately singled to center field, spurring Hoying from second base for the deciding run.

Szado was marked for the loss for the Minutemen, giving up four runs while fanning seven batters. Rosendahl (2-4) scattered three runs (one earned) and eight hits over nine innings to gather the victors. He struck out six UMass sluggers while walking just one.

The Minutemen will look to regain their winning ways when they return to action in New Britain, Conn. on Wednesday to take on Central Connecticut. The first pitch is scheduled to be thrown at 3:00 p.m.

Men's tennis in a freefall

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

When considering the plight of the Massachusetts men's tennis team, it is important to keep things in perspective. The '86 Boston Red Sox had it worse. So did golfer Greg Norman when he watched the Masters title elude him in '96. And it's safe to say that the disintegration of the Boston Celtics dynasty over the past decade has been far more trying than what the Maroon and White have experienced this season.

Still, the Minutemen's transition from great to gruesome can certainly be considered one of heart-wrenching proportions.

For the beleaguered squad, the spring season has been about as successful as Jack E. Robinson's Senate bid. The spring statistics are an eyesore. Despite an undefeated fall campaign, the team's record has since dissolved into mediocrity. After dropping two dual matches to Temple and Villanova this weekend, the Minutemen now stand at 2-9 for the spring, and 7-9 for the season. They are currently riding a five-match losing streak.

"Team morale is definitely down," assistant coach Scott Wilkins mused. "Part of it is the tougher schedule, plus the injuries at the beginning of the season, but we're injury-free now. We're just stuck in a rut and we're still waiting for that one match where everyone comes together."

Such a match was not in the cards this weekend. On Saturday, the squad faced Temple on the road, where they were crushed, 7-0.

In No. 1 singles, sophomore Steve Prisco was trounced by Temple's Pero Pivcevic in straight sets, 6-3, 6-4. Meanwhile, junior Fabien Rabanal, who recently took over the No. 2 spot in the line-up, lost to Go Sasaki, 7-5, 6-3.

"Fabien has given us a good spirited effort. He's been very vocal and positive, and he's shown a lot of grit and determination," Wilkins noted. "The No. 2 spot is a very difficult spot. Whoever plays No. 2 for us is going to have a struggle."

Senior Bo Navarro can attest to that. He recently was bumped to the No. 5 slot due to his lack of success at No. 2. Despite this line-up maneuvering, Navarro was unable to claim victory against Temple. However, the struggling co-captain was able to nab the first set from Krishane Pillay before losing, 2-6, 6-3, 6-3.

"Tweaking the line-up is somewhat natural when people just aren't winning," Wilkins said of the recent line-up shuffling. "Bo was not winning at No. 2. So, we move him to No. 5, maybe No. 4, to help him get some easier wins and get his confidence back."

In the No. 4 slot, senior co-captain Parsa Samii was a straight set victim to Jordan Huffer, 6-3, 6-3. Meanwhile, freshman Will Shaw ran out of steam after grabbing the first set in his No. 5 singles match. He eventually lost to Temple's Marty Underwood, 4-6, 6-1, 7-5. Sophomore Todd Champeau rounded out singles action with a straight set

Crew: the class of Lake Coventry

By Adam De Young

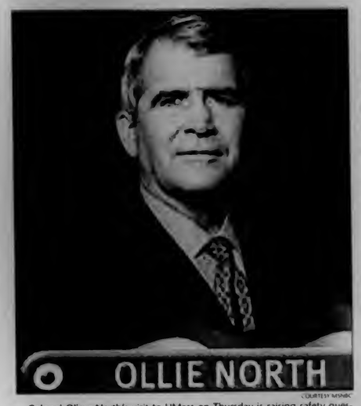
It was April Fool's Day, but the joke was on the University of Connecticut and the Coast Guard Academy, as the Massachusetts women's crew team rowed across the clear waters of Lake Coventry in Storrs, CT for its third win of the season.

Led by a strong showing from their first and second varsity eight teams, the No. 22 Minutewomen were victorious in four of five races Saturday.

Aside from a slight crosswind at the start, the conditions were good. Some of the races were shortened slightly due to some problems aligning the starting line.

UMass was in stride early, as the first Varsity Eight team downed the nearest boat, UConn's, by just under nine seconds, however, it would be the second varsity eight that would completely blow the competition out of the water, with 18 seconds separating them and the Huskies. The Coast Guard finished third in the two races.



In the novice eight race, UMass sandwiched the competitors, with the Minutewoman A team finishing first and the B team finished just behind Coast Guard in last place. This race was the closest of the day, as UMass would edge out Connecticut for first place by just 2.8 seconds. The Minutewoman B team would finish dead last behind the Coast Guard in their only loss to the Academy.

UMass dominated the novice four race, as 17.4 sec-

North visit could spawn walkout

COURTESY MSNBC

Colonel Oliver North's visit to UMass on Thursday is raising safety questions as students threaten a walkout.

By Brian Lohnes
Collegian staff

Colonel Oliver North's visit to campus on Thursday has raised questions about a campus-wide walkout. North, a former high-ranking defense official under Ronald Regan was very involved with the Iran-Contra affair and with American military operations in Central American countries. Flyers have been circulating around campus calling for an all-campus walkout to protest North's visit.

North is being sponsored by the UMass Republican Club, and according to them, security measures are in place for North.

Republican club member Zack Spilman said, "We are working with the department of public safety," he also added, "We have set up designated protesting areas to prevent disruptions for the Colonel."

The flyers circulated around campus accuse North of being a "terrorist" and claim among other things that he "killed Innocent Nicaraguans." It continues on to claim he is a, "Radical right-wing zealot, a perjurer and a liar and a racist oppressor." Also, a large picture on the flyer shows a picture of North taking an oath with the words, "Heil Regan" in front of his face.

Club President Michael Rossettie said, "We are basing our security on other groups who have had big speakers like Charlton Heston at Brandeis." Rossettie also said that they have established the designated protest area on the grass area in the Haigis Mall.

"We will have a full-time police officer on duty from 10 to two o'clock and the UMass police have been notified and they are sending a couple of officers in plain clothes," said Rossetti.

When he was asked about the protest flyer, Rossetti said that he wanted to be contacted by the group that was hanging the flyers. "Our main concern is to make sure that the people who want to see Col. North have free access and that their safety is not in danger." He continued, " I don't have a problem with people protesting. I'd prefer they wouldn't but what can we do?"

North has two or three security people that he travels with and there will be Republican club staff members with North at all times and the largest members of the club will be at the Fine Arts Center.

"There will be no signs allowed inside, and people disrupting the talk will be removed." Rossetti continued. "Also, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos will review the picketing code on campus, because many times it is violated at protests."

The event is free to the public and there will be priority seating available to VIP guests. This is the first time that the club could afford to have North come speak and they received monetary support from a conservative group known as "Young Americans."

North will not be walking around campus, his time is limited because he needs to return to Washington D.C. in the evening to film his television show, "Equal Time" which airs on MSNBC.

Rossetti stressed the fact that he wanted to be contacted by anyone planning to protest the event in the hopes of working with them so both sides could benefit.

"It's people's right to protest, they have the legal right to do it," he said.

Col. North will be making his speech at noon in the Fine Arts Center Lobby.

Arrests made at Mullins Center

By Daniel Rustenik
Collegian Staff

According to the University of Massachusetts police department, the Red Hot Chili Peppers' concert at the Mullins center on Sunday, April 2 was relatively smooth. UMass police arrested two individuals in nearby parking lots for drug possession and two individuals for drug possession with intent to distribute in an undercover operation.

In the concert, police dealt with numerous medical emergencies and arrested one individual for disorderly conduct. Also during the weekend, police arrested three individuals in McNamara Dorm for possession of marijuana.

Police arrested Allan Proskin, age 43, of Voorheesville, NY, Michael Robert O'Connor, age 36, of Springfield, David F. Brady, age 27 of Worcester, and Rene Hugo Cuadro, age 18, of Wilbraham in Lot 25 during the night of the concert. All four are being charged with possession of various drugs, including marijuana and psychedelic mushrooms. In addition, distribution charges will are being filed against Proskin and Brady.

Barbara O'Connor, deputy chief of UMass police said "It is not unusual that this type of event would bring people to campus to sell their products and this is not something we are going to tolerate. There [were] a number of plain-clothes officers in the lots and if they saw illegal activity they took appropriate action."

Roundup

Jim Lyons UMPD spokesman, said that this sort of operation is not unusual during concerts or other events at UMass. Several police departments from surrounding towns participate "in regular attempts to control illegal drugs."

There were also several other drug law violations before, during and after the concert but no arrests were made.

In total there were over 16 medical emergencies during or after the concert.

Lyons said that most of the medical emergencies "had to do with exhaustion and people doing what they do at these concerts, 'Mosh' pits or whatever."

Lyons said that there were a large number of people at the concert and these sorts of events are expected. There were ambulances and EMT's on sight as there are at most large events on campus including graduation.

Bryan J. Hurlbut, age 22, of West Springfield was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct. According to Lyons, "It looks like there was an attempt to climb over a barrier into the concert. [The individual] got into a wrestling match with a Mullins Center employee."

O'Connor said, "I think the crowd was well behaved. One arrest for disorderly conduct is minor. By and large the event went really well."

Also during the weekend Dustin Johnson, age 21, Rami M. Zentgraf, age 30 and Patrick Commander, age 21 were all arrested in a student's room in McNamara dorm at 1:41 a.m. on Saturday for possession of marijuana. A member of the housing staff had notified the UMPD that they smelled marijuana smoke and UMPD officers responded.

Lyons said, "Basically it was reported in the dormitory a strong odor of marijuana burning. Officers were called into to investigate and through their observations arrested three individuals."

By Melissa Hammel

Last week, three University of Massachusetts students pleaded innocent to charges of raping a 15-year-old girl in February in Amherst.

The students, Roberto B. Andrade, age 25, of 111 Colonial Village was charged with three counts of rape and abuse of a child under the age of 16; Joaquim A. Alves age 21, of 908 Kennedy Residence Hall at UMass, was charged with one count of rape and abuse of a child; and Renato A. Brandao, age 23, of 802 John Adams Residence Hall at UMass, was charged with one count of indecent assault with the intent to rape, and two counts of rape and abuse of a minor.

According to the affidavit submitted by the Amherst Police, in order to obtain a warrant to search the Colonial Village apartment, the victim told police that while at a party on February 25, at around 11 p.m. she met three men, one of whom she recognized as a student teacher at Amherst Regional High. Police documents indicate that the victim did not know the full names of the three men, and it remains unclear as to whether or not the student teacher was one of the accused.

At midnight, she and the four men left the party and went to a dorm room within UMass, where the victim claims she was sexually assaulted. She and the four men left the room at approximately 1 a.m. and met two other men in the parking lot. All six passengers got into the car, four exited at Amherst College, while two others continued on to an apartment in Colonial Village. At the apartment, the victim said in her police statement, she had sex on the sofa with one of the men, although she told her that she was only 15-years-old.

No statements have been made as to whether or not the victim consented to sexual intercourse in any way. However, in the state of Massachusetts, by law sex with anyone under the age of 16 is not considered to be consensual.

Both Brandao and Alves are being charged with activity that was believed to have taken place in the dorm room, while Andrade is charged with activity in both the room and at the apartment.

The three were indicted by a Hampshire County grand jury on March 14 in connection with the alleged sexual activity. All three later appeared in Hampshire Superior Court last Thursday and were released on their own personal recognizance and with the stipulation that they have no contact with the alleged victim.

All three are to report to the probation department and are to appear on June 19 for status hearings.

Irish poet coming to UMass for visit

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The Annual Troy Lecture Series sponsored by the University of Massachusetts English Department invites Nobel Prize-winning poet Seamus Heaney to read at the Campus Center Auditorium tonight.

Heaney is the third Nobel Prize winner the Troy Lecture Series has brought to UMass. But more importantly, Heaney is the fourth Irishman to win a Nobel Prize after William Butler Yeats, Samuel Beckett and George Bernard Shaw.

Peggy O'Brien, Associate Professor of Irish Literature, agrees that Heaney is "right up there" with the famous poets.

Heaney has published nine successful books of poetry, in addition to his most recent success, Beowulf. He translated Beowulf, the famous 1,000-year-old Anglo-Saxon epic, poured over by high school and college students, and it now stands as one of the best-selling books in both America and England, according to the New York Times best-seller list.

Heaney was born in 1939 in the village of Mossbawn, Country Derry, in Northern Ireland. He studied at Queen's University, Belfast, taught at Oxford University and more recently, at Harvard University. Although he currently resides in Dublin, it is his years growing up in Northern Ireland as a Catholic that have given his poetry a political edge. It is because of this element of his writing that he is often linked to Yeats.

O'Brien said, "[Despite his background] he managed throughout 30 years to always remain even-handed. [He is] a major social force for even-handedness." She also added "he stays very close to what he

On-campus mail issues plague students

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

While the mail changes each day, one noticeable constant remains: the stack of unidentifiable envelopes that pile up below the mailboxes of Johnson Dormitory at the University of Massachusetts.

One day last month, instead of the usual credit card applications or other bulk mail, three summonses for jury duty sat atop a five-inch stack of letters sent to students who no longer live at Johnson Residence Hall in Northeast Residential Area.

Whether they're junk mail or important notices, letters litter other dormitories on the Amherst campus as well.

The problem with delivering the student mail at the University of Massachusetts stems from the lack of emphasis during the training of mail sorters, officials said.

One student was angered by the mail sorters disregard for her jury duty notice, which was sent to a former address and discarded in a pile. UMass sophomore Rebecca D. Anderson, who lived in Johnson Residence Hall during the fall semester, moved to Alpha Kai Omega sorority house for the spring semester.

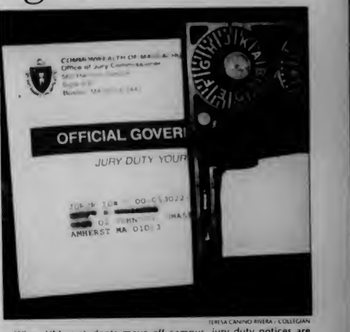
Yet her mail continues to be delivered to her old address. Last month, her jury duty envelope was one of three that sat atop the pile of junk and misdirected mail in Johnson dormitory. She said, if not for her former roommate, she would have missed the call for jury duty. Anderson said her former roommate called her, telling her that mail was still arriving at her old address, and mentioning the jury duty envelope.

Anderson said that she began to worry because of the fine involved with missing jury duty. Finally her new jury duty summons arrived at the correct address, just one week before the date of summons. After speaking with her former roommate again, an angry Anderson learned that it was the third notice sent.

"I got it last Thursday, and I had to go this Thursday," Anderson nervously said of the notice. "My old roommate had to call me and tell me. What if I still wasn't friends with her? I would have never known. I would have st my pants."

Anderson said that most of the mail that her former roommate receives comes from credit-card companies or other bulk-mailing centers. While she said she is furious about the discarded jury duty envelope, she said she overall was satisfied with the on-campus mail redirection process.

The Southwest Area Director Jean Alstrand-MacKimmie said that such mistakes are made because student employees who sort the mail do not check a printed database of residents' names that indicates which mailbox belongs to which student.



The list, she said, is updated weekly, and provided for the employees that sort the mail for each residence hall on campus. She said a simple solution would be a computerized database.

Her comments came after learning of the confusion to begin the spring semester. Most complications occur because of the month-long semester break, when no mail is delivered. The university often attempts to sort the month's worth of mail as quickly as possible for returning students, she said.

Commonly, students who have moved find in their mailbox credit card bills or other pieces of mail addressed to past residents. Although the university provides a bin and posts a reminder sign for misdirected mail in every dormitory, many students drop the misdirected mail on the floor, creating an enormous pile after a week, said Alstrand-MacKimmie.

Richard Clarity, director of the campus mail office, concurs with her sentiments on better training for mail sorters.

Along with other residential area directors, he and Alstrand-MacKinnnie cooperatively manage the mail system from different ends. While Alstrand-MacKinnnie supervises the people who hire mail sorters, Clarity is mostly in charge of misdirected mail once it is returned. But he agrees that such mail is seldom dropped into the misdirected bin.

Unlike the mail sorting policy, his forwarding mail office takes special care of important notices like jury duty envelopes or letters from the Department of Motor Vehicles, he said.

"When we get returned mail we pull those types of things out right away. Those are important. The sorters really should have taken care of them in the first place," Clarity said. "Part of the problem is that some students do not return misdirected mail."

According to Clarity, when his workers pick up misdirected mail from each dormitory, they must report to him any possible problems – even if the residence hall does not report them. Clarity said that these workers are asked to look for mail lying on the floor and any damage to mailboxes as well.

If they find anything unusual, Clarity said he reports his concern to the residential office, but can only encourage, not implement change. He also conceded that the system is unusual and not ideal.

For students who move, to avoid these problems, Alstrand-MacKinnnie said that they should first properly check out of their old dorms. Secondly, she said that relocated students should notify their creditors or anyone else who might send them mail. What worries her, however, is the misdirected mail that relocated students cannot control, specifically jury duty envelopes.

Throwing mail on the floor is not a responsible thing to do," said Alstrand-MacKinnnie, who said that residents could help by not mistreating any misdirected mail. "We should take neighborly responsibility, but that just won't always happen but I guess this could be an issue brought up in training. We could certainly look at training materials and highlight some sections for the sorters to take extra care with important mail."

On the other hand, Alstrand-MacKinnnie sympathized with the sorters because of the nature of the UMass mail system, which does not provide a central mail outpost for students, but instead routes mail to individual residence halls.

Alstrand-MacKinnnie also defended the sorters, citing that an improved system could meet them half way. Hired by both residential directors and assistant directors, the sorters, usually students, rely on a paper database of residents within each dorm. Alstrand-MacKinnnie said she wants a database computerized. This step, she said, would allow the name labels on the reverse side of mailboxes to be quickly changed if a student moves.

"We know [misdirected mail] is a concern, but it's not always easy for the sorter to know about the changes especially if one is made right away," she said.

The call for a computerized system by proponents like Alstrand-MacKinnnie was a topic only recently discussed in meetings between the housing assignment offices and the area directors, she said. When the groups first met to discuss mail concerns two years ago, the main worry was mail theft. As was the case for problems of the past, Alstrand-MacKinnnie said that the current request for computerized labels will eventually alleviate much of the misdirection problem.

Maryland minister wins in legal battle

By Bill Miller
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – A Maryland minister has prevailed in a legal fight over his right to lead small groups of people in prayer while they tour the U.S. Capitol.

The Rev. Pierre Bynum, a pastor from Charles County, Md., filed a federal lawsuit after Capitol Police threatened to arrest him in November 1996 for conducting a "prayer tour" of the building. Capitol Police said Bynum was staging an illegal demonstration.

U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman said that Bynum's actions were not a form of demonstration and that Bynum had a constitutional right to engage in free speech.

In a 17-page decision released Monday, the judge said Capitol Police improperly relied upon a regulation created to prevent disruptions on Capitol grounds and found that Bynum and his group had caused no disturbance by praying. The regulation bars unspecified kinds of "expressive conduct" but makes no mention of prayer.

"It's a tremendous victory," Bynum said of the ruling. "When this event first happened, we were absolutely stupefied... We were praying for our country."

Bynum, 51, is a leader of a group called Capitol Hill Prayer Alert that prays for the United States, its government and elected officials.

Among other things, the group's Web site encourages people to pray for God's "sudden sovereign intervention" to turn President Clinton and other political leaders against abortion and homosexuality.

Bynum's Capitol tour, conducted just before the 1996 presidential election, was part of a series of visits linked with a 40-day prayer vigil. He said he had taken guests on similar tours there about 50 times until he was threatened with arrest Nov. 3, 1996. At the time, Bynum was associate pastor of Waldorf Christian Assembly in Waldorf.

That day, Bynum was leading his family and a small Northern Virginia church group to various historic sites within the building.

Along the way, Bynum occasionally paused to raise topics for reflection, and the people in the group closed their eyes, bowed their heads and folded their hands. Then Capitol Police ordered the activity to stop.

knows."

O'Brien explains that Irish poetry is very important to the society and Heaney's voice in particular carries a lot of moral weight.

O'Brien lived in Dublin for 20 years, at which time she met Heaney. She describes Heaney as a learned man, gentleman, and family man, responsible and – "everything the opposite of how they would perceive the Irish poet."

Heaney is also a foreign member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters and recently retired from the Boylston Chair at Harvard. He still continues to teach on a part-time basis. As a teacher, Heaney proved to be an influence for a younger generation of Irish poets, namely former UMass professor Paul Muldoon.

The reading will be held in the Campus Center Auditorium at 5 p.m. and it is free and open to the public.

O'Brien, who arranged the event, said, "Rarely do I see people come away from a reading without learning a lot about poetry... "You can hear and see and smell his poetry."

Gore explains new Social Security proposals

Vice-President attacks Bush's plan of cutting taxes and private investments

By Dan Balz
The Washington Post

PHILADELPHIA – Vice President Al Gore yesterday proposed two ground breaking changes to the Social Security system that he said would make it fairer to women and charged that Texas Gov. George W. Bush, as president, would quickly turn the retirement program into "a system of social insecurity."

Gore charged that Bush's proposals for deep tax cuts and for allowing workers to invest part of their payroll taxes into private savings accounts would undermine what he called "the greatest act of social policy" in the country's history.

"I'm fighting to save Social Security the right way while my opponent is treating it as an afterthought at best and a tax-cutting piggy bank at worst," Gore told an audience at a South Philadelphia community center.

Gore's direct attack on Bush at a community forum marked another escalation in their ongoing debate over the future of the government retirement program that began two weeks ago when the presumptive Republican nominee charged that Gore was "an obstacle to reform" of the system.

Bush, who was also campaigning in Pennsylvania yesterday, responded to Gore's latest attack by reasserting his support for private savings accounts and said he was prepared to use the political capital necessary to reform the system while Gore was not. "I can't think of a better reform than allowing women to manage their own personal savings accounts, particularly younger workers in our society," Bush told reporters.

Bush said the issue would be central to the campaign debate this year. "It is the status quo in the administration that does not try to reform Social Security versus an administration that will put capital on the line to say, Republicans and Democrats must come together to make sure that the Social Security system is available in the long run," he said.

On a day when the investors experienced a wild ride on Wall Street, Gore charged that Bush's willingness to partially privatize the Social Security system would subject working families to a form of "stock market roulette" that could leave families worse off, not better. "I believe it's wrong to ask our elderly to roll the dice with their retirement savings," he said.

The vice president also invoked Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., to attack Bush, noting that it was McCain who criticized the Texas governor during the GOP primaries for not devoting more of the future budget surpluses to shoring up Social Security.

"If you ask me, John McCain was right and George W. Bush was and is wrong on Social Security," Gore said.

Although Gore has never delivered a formal policy statement on Social Security, he again reiterated his support for the Clinton administration's plan, which calls for paying down the national debt and using the savings in interest payments to begin shoring up the system beginning in 2011. Those changes, Gore's campaign said, would extend the life of the system until about 2050.

Bush has yet to detail a Social Security reform plan, but has said it will be based on the principle that workers should have the right to invest part of their payroll taxes into private savings accounts. The governor also has not ruled out further increases in the retirement age.

Gore first called for eliminating what he termed the "motherhood penalty" by offering an earnings credit for women who leave the work force for a time to raise their children. The provision would affect about eight million women, and the average increase in benefits would be about $600.

Currently, women who stay at home with their children lose those earnings years when Social Security benefits are figured. Gore proposed giving women credit for up to five years outside the work force, valued initially at $16,500 a year and then indexed for inflation.

Gore said his other proposal would help women who lose Social Security benefits when their husbands die. On average, widows receive about 62 percent of what the combined benefits were when their husbands were alive. Gore proposed changes that would raise that to 75 percent, a change that would benefit about three million widows and widowers.

Our Opinion

Keep sports out of court

Yesterday, when Canadian officials announced an October 2 commencement for court proceedings against Boston Bruins defenseman Marty McSorley, they set a lot more than a court date.

They set one of the most dangerous precedents in the history of sports and law.

No longer are McSorley's actions against Vancouver left wing Donald Brashear on February 21 of this year just fodder for repeated highlight reels. They are now key facts and evidence in a trial that could land a 37-year-old man in jail for assault.

We at the Daily Collegian feel that this incident ending up in a court of law is just as appalling as the two-handed chop with which McSorley felled Brashear in the first place.

First of all, it is necessary to clarify that the actions of the Bruin enforcer were by no means excusable. In a sport that is virtually defined by violence, it is absolutely necessary to regulate the use of physical force by penalizing those who cannot recognize where to draw the proverbial line.

But herein lies the problem. Excessive force in the sport of hockey is difficult enough to define, considering that contact is such an integral part of the game. Sending an opponent crashing headfirst into the boards is perfectly acceptable, legal even, as long as it is done "clean-ly."

So when does a hip check thrown or an elbow swung at a jaw cross that same line and go from fundamental hockey to an actual assault? And more importantly, what has to happen for such an incident to transform from an inappropriate on-ice infraction to a criminal act?

It is beyond question that swinging a hockey stick at another human being's head warrants swift and decisive action on the part of the league. action that came in this instance in the form of McSorley's suspension for the remainder of the season. But to make this athlete stand trial outside the hockey rink is to open a virtual Pandora's Box in regards to violence in other sports.

Major league pitchers such as Roger Clemens and Pedro Martinez, who regularly top 90 mph on the radar gun, have admitted to purposely throwing at batters as a retaliatory tactic. Boston fans familiar with the tragic story of Tony Conigliaro know all too well exactly how much damage a baseball can inflict on a batter's career, let alone his anatomy.

So who is to say that McSorley's chop was a criminal act, but chin music from Randy Johnson is simply a part of the game?

And for that matter, how can it be said that hitting an opposing player with a stick is worse than sending him crashing, headfirst and at a very high rate of speed, into a wall? When Pittsburgh's Bob Boughner sent Carolina's Rob Brind'Amour to the hospital with possible brain damage Monday after a particularly ruthless check, Boughner received a major penalty for boarding and a game misconduct. He did not, however, receive a subpoena or a police escort out of the building.

Marty McSorley deserves to be punished for his cheap shot on Donald Brashear. He deserves to be severely reprimanded by the league and his team. He even deserves to be ostracized by both his peers and fans of the team and sport.

He does not, however, deserve to face jail time for his actions.

I'm only joking, don't worry

"Some people don't like you to talk like that, some people like to shut you up for saying those things. You know that, lots of people, lots of groups in this country want to tell you how to talk, tell you what you can't talk about. Well sometimes they'll say you can talk about something but you can't joke about it, say you can't joke about something because it's not funny, comedians run into that shit all the time... I believe you can joke about anything, it all depends on how you construct the joke."

–George Carlin

Comedians may be America's greatest and most effective social critics: their ability to connect to listeners with laughter automatically can rally people to their side in ways that serious critics cannot; they let people enjoy themselves in serious situations.

And that includes the above example. People's desperate attempts at a politically correct world trail are stifling what people can and cannot say, what they can and can't joke about. People really seem interested in jokes that are non-offensive, jokes based in the ridiculous because "those are funny."

They can be, but jokes based on the serious are all the better; anything based on fact works so much better that something initially false and taken from there. Chancellor Scott screwing a goat is funny; Chancellor Scott supporting dryshops instead of sweatshops is hilarious. It's all fake, non-offensive, versus real, potentially offensive.

The other day, Joe, a new reporter for us, came in to tell me that one of our April Fool's day articles was really going too far. He sort of flip-flopped on his position the more he heard me explain the reasoning behind it, but his initial response was that we'd gone too far. Linda Nolan, leader of the Commonwealth College and the individual primarily mentioned in the article, was also none too pleased, stating that "if anyone read the Collegian," they'd think the Commonwealth College was a white and elitist institution.

Sam Wilkinson

Why it would take that article to help people figure that out is beyond me, but the point is, the jokes made were absolutely grounded in fact.

Last year, two of the 500 some students admitted to the Commonwealth College were black. Two. Another seven, in the interest of diversity I suppose, were Latino, as well as 36 Asians.

That isn't a fact we could scrub when it came to writing the article in question; it's just a reality, a shocking reality, a horrific reality and really quite pathetic in terms of our supposedly open campus. And that's the point: the people that read that article and were amused, if nothing else, take away from the article the fact itself. Everybody gets their laughs, but they also get the incredibly hard to digest fact.

"I believe you can joke about anything; all depends on how you construct the joke, what the exaggeration is, what the exaggeration is, because every joke needs one exaggeration, every joke needs one thing to be way out of proportion."

–George Carlin

Joe thought the joke was aimed at the Commonwealth College student body and seemed relieved, if only sort of, when I assured him it wasn't in anyway meant to skew the students involved. What say do they have over their peers? Very little.

But Nolan does.

She has a lot of control over such things, one would assume, as she leads the place. And like any good jokesters, we got the one fact in there that was way out of proportion.

UMass is never going to kick students out of the Commonwealth College. Chancellor Scott would never actually committ on the record that he feels all white education is a necessity. Nolan would never compare the ALANA caucus to gardeners and The Minuteman would never write that the school should be void of anybody that wasn't a straight, white male. If you feel otherwise, that's your opinion, Ahem.

The point is that both Joe and most likely, Nolan, felt that we were making jokes that we shouldn't have been allowed to make. Jokes that should have been closeted and kept to ourselves, but jokes are a great way to share information amongst people.

For some reason, the left has this feeling that there are certain things that shouldn't be said, a strange position to take considering their supposed interest in all things free. Meanwhile, the right wing, who rail against all things PC, are no better, simply choosing to pick other things that shouldn't be talked about.

For the left, minorities of any sort or another should never be touched, scathed, mocked, mentioned, demeaned or joked about. For the right, minorities of any sort should never be mentioned, as they challenge our inherent beliefs in the American social system.

Hell, the Commonwealth College article is a perfect example; the left-wing Joe, thought it was out of line because of the negative attitude towards blacks, while the right-wing, Nolan, seemed to be against mentioning the apparently massive disparity in the College.

And both of these individuals as Carlin would put it, want to shut us up when it comes to mentioning such things. But if it isn't mentioned it's never mentioned, it's forgotten, and it goes by the wayside.

I'm not writting to defend our April Fool's issue as being a paragon of virtue. However, some of the things that we mentioned weren't liked because they were based in fact, rather than in any of the usual ridiculousness of April Fools Day, and the dislike, and subsequent attempt to question its initial mention, are dangerous steps on a dangerous road. When we can't joke about failure of the Commonwealth College to include anyone who isn't white, or we then only joke about things that aren't true? And if we can only joke about things that aren't true, what's so funny?

Just some random thoughts

A few things to touch upon this week:

First of all, squirrels are devilish little creatures, with eyes as black as the depths of hell itself, and a set of teeth ripe for showering blood and mayhem down upon us all. Pretty graphic, huh? But also, I fear, pretty true. Now, needless to say, I didn't always feel this way. In fact, I never saw squirrels as the hell-spawned mongrels that they are until I came here to UMass. Like all young children, I thought squirrels were these cute, cuddly animals, and I longed to have one as my very own pet. They've got those furry bodies and bushy little tails, they're huggably cute. I mean, what's not to love? I still remember the was I would smile when my mother said, "Now look, little Dana, that's where Mr. Squirrel and his family live," as we walked by the big hole in the oak tree out front. I would always throw a few acorns inside, for hope that maybe one day Mr. Squirrel would come to thank me for my generosity.

Dana Oppedisano

Now, I have seen literally thousands of squirrels in my lifetime – living in the tree outside my house, running along telephone wires, flattened as roadkill (sorry, I couldn't help it), but I never really got a good look at one. Squirrels are the type of critters that the moment you step in their direction, they run like the wind. I remember being a little kid and creeping up as slowly as I could, but the little buggers would always hear me and go scattering away. That is, until I came to Amherst. For some reason, squirrels on this campus are completely unfazed by people altogether. They just run around collectively spilled in diagonal lines apparently as a sign for them to stop as I step into their paths.

Oh wait, there is more. They put up a three yellow barrels in the middle of the two lanes with more blinking yellow lights and a pedestrian symbol internationally translated as "moving target." I'm saved, I can frolic free across campus without fear that I will be struck or be forced to look at ugly buildings. Thank you UMass, thank you for saving me.

It is necessary to take corrective measures when tragedies occur. Isn't it obvious that some misfortunes can actually be avoided if steps are taken to prevent them in the first place? Apparently not, otherwise we would not be looking to move our football team up to Division I-A.

If it ain't broke, chances are it probably needs to be fixed on this campus. Until then, I'll be walking near the blinking yellow lights and bringing my swim trunks to the office.

Ken McDonald is a Collegian columnist.

Too little, too late

There is an old saying that goes something like, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

There is also a saying that, "This is more fun than a barrel of monkeys."

The point is, there are a lot of stupid things that our grandparents and parents said to us that do not apply to today's society and probably didn't then either. Anyone who believed that a barrel of monkeys was fun was probably dipping their paws a little to far in the ether jar, if you know what I'm saying.

I realized yesterday morning that UMass subscribes to the former adage in full force. When I walked into our expansive myriad of Collegian offices, I was greeted by a virtual army of physical plant workers and Campus Center janitorial staff. Some were even wearing ties; I assumed these to be field generals who had come down to survey the battlefield. As I approached the epicenter, I realized what the entire hubbub was about: a pipe had burst, spilling its infiltered contents over our then-new ink machine. There must have been 15 people in the newsroom with wet-vacs, mops and even twisty straws trying to soak up the mess and stem the tide from the apparent ocean above.

Ken McDonald

"I question an administration that decided to renovate the outside of Goessman Hall while the lecture halls contained within are lit by candles and heated by rubbing two hands together and huddling in a tight circle."

In listening to a conversation between one of the "generals" and Marty, our very own fearless leader in the Business Office, it became clear as to what had happened. After he asked me if I wasn't taking notes, he began to explain that there had been some repairs made to that area a few years back, but, it wasn't done right.

As people began to row by me two by two, I began to think that this guy might be onto something.

Continuing, he said that there would be some temporary stopgap measures put in place (read: bubble gum) to make sure that ice would not be using flippers and oxygen tanks to get the paper out. I must add, these people were very polite and concerned that they would not interrupt the sanctity that is the Collegian newsroom. It is not their fault that they are given a five-spot and told to, "Fix UMass."

You may recognize such other famous UMass stopgap measures as the light that was put up as a result of the assaults last semester or the fancy-schmancy new crosswalk put up adjacent to parking services after a student was struck and killed last year. I question an administration that decided to renovate the outside of Goessman Hall while the lecture halls contained within are lit by candles and heated by rubbing two hands together and huddling in a tight circle. It is really not my "barrel of monkeys" to take my life into my hands as I cross the Auditorium in order to get back to Southwest. All motorists have to go by as a hint that I might be crossing there is a single blinking yellow light and some white paint that physical plant accidentally spilled in diagonal lines apparently as a sign for them to stop as I step into their paths.

UMass Psychology student explores Shepard's impact

By Meg Hebert
Collegian Staff

On March 23, Monique Noell, M.S., a doctoral candidate in Clinical Psychology at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, presented, "The Ripple Effect of a Hate Crime: The Psychological Impact of the Shepard Murder." This lecture was part of The Stonewall Center's Thursday lecture series.

Noelle was a teacher assistant for a psychology class when she noticed that the murder of Matthew Shepard affected people in the class poignantly. This prompted Noelle to investigate the reactions of bisexual, gay and lesbian people who said they were deeply affected by Shepard's murder.

Four to six months after the crime, nine individuals, ranging in age from late teens to early fifties, were interviewed about their reactions to Shepard's murder. Eight of these people had experienced hate crime victimization or threats – six verbal and two physical – but none had been bodily assaulted. The interviewees were mostly white, with racial/ethnic identity playing a role for one individual.

Noelle uses the "ripple effect" as defined by Herek and Berrill. "Every [hate crime] carries a message to the victim and the entire community of which he or she is a part. Each anti-gay attack is, in effect, a punishment for stepping outside culturally accepted norms and a warning to all gay and lesbian people to stay in 'their place,' the invisibility and self-hatred of the closet."

Noelle notes that the "ripple effect underscores the importance of hate crime activism and legislation. [It] sets hate crimes apart form non-hate crimes, suggesting greater punishment is warranted. Perpetrators [of hate crimes] may 'send a message,' but they also produce effects counter to their aims – increased activism, community, and outness."

Noelle found that Shepard's murder caused people to question fundamental assumptions such as the benevolence and meaningfulness of the world, the benevolence of people, and the illusion of invulnerability. Emotional reactions to Shepard's murder included sadness, depression, grief, fear, anger, disbelief and guilt. Feelings of guilt arose for people who felt as though they had not done enough to combat homophobia or hate crimes.

Based on the definition of the ripple effect by Herek and Berrill, identification with the victim is necessary for the effect to take place. All of these people identified with Shepard based on sexual orientation, and four people identified with him in other ways. Five of these people also identified Shepard with another person.

Five males were interviewed (one bisexual and four gay) and four females (described as one lesbian, one queer, one dyke, and one bisexual). Five of these individuals experienced a closeting effect after Shepard's murder, while three were brought out of the closet, and one person experienced both effects.

Shepard's murder caused both negative and positive behavior changes for these people. Some became less visible [as GBLQ or D] for safety reasons. People's activism levels were affected, and increased caution was adopted.

In closing, Noelle noted the strengths and limitations of this research. The qualitative methods used to lead to in-depth interviews, but little predictive ability regarding other people's reactions to Shepard's murder. Trauma research is best done using an individualistic approach as was done here. The group, however, was not ethnically/racially diverse. More extreme trauma-like reactions would have been reported if the interviews took place closer to the time of the crime.

Monique Noell gave a presentation in relation to the effects of such hate crimes as the murder of Matthew Shephard last month.

Chucky's unnecessary death leaves bad taste

Ryan Conradi

I will never forget the way I felt when I saw an awful horror movie on my first semester at UMass. I had just attended a Matthew Shepherd vigil in Amherst Center the week before. It was a real bad reason for everyone to have to gather, but I was pleased that something good could come out of something so horrible. While I was terrified by the event that prompted the vigil, I thought that it was great that people came together and spoke up instead of just letting it slide away without comment. Many brought up the point that our society not only promotes, but even awards prejudice and hate.

After seeing a movie called Bride Of Chucky, I was shocked to find out how true this is. The movie contained a gay character named David, who was a friend of the main characters. At first it appeared that this character was important, and that it was okay to be gay. However, it soon became apparent that this was not the case. As I was watching the movie, any feeling of peace and any sense of humor I had was destroyed instantly when the gay character carelessly stepped out into the street and his body exploded like a watermelon against a wall as he was brutally killed by a truck. I was shocked, sickened and disgusted as people cheered loudly as if they were at a football game. It became very clear to me why the gay character was in the movie at that point: he was simply created to be killed in celebration.

The unrealistic and bloody explosion of his body was created to get the audience going. It was extremely frightening to realize that people right in the same theater, people I probably walk by every day, could think the killing of a gay person was hilarious. As the friend I was with later put it "If I had worn a pink triangle, I could have been beaten or killed."

In addition, this film was also very sexist, and there was not one non-Caucasian person in the film. Now it is true that people do get killed in horror films, but this person wasn't killed by anyone or for any reason, he just simply stepped in front of a truck and was never mentioned again. The scariest part is you start to think about how many people thought this was perfectly acceptable. It's hard to believe anyone would watch such trash, but it's even harder to believe Universal would produce it, actors would act in it, theaters would show it, and people would pay to see it. Did they ever stop to think about what their actions might cause someone to do?

Didn't it bother them to see a movie where they killed a gay character for laughs less than two weeks after the brutal murder of Matthew Shepard? I should have walked out and demanded my money back as soon as that happened.

I was unable to enjoy the remainder of the rest of the film. They did turn down the Hampshire 8 sound level, so I don't have to be reminded of it at the mall, but to this day whenever I see a "Bride Of Chucky" video, DVD cover or soundtrack, I still feel anger and outrage. I have never seen another movie that has made me so angry, and I certainly I hope I never have to.

Head's versatility shines

By Meg Hebert
Collegian Staff

"I hope she comes back!" proclaimed one pleased audience member. She was referring to Angie Head, the humorous folk singer, brought to UMass by the Stonewall Center. Head gave a great performance for the Black History Month Cafe. Yes, this is old news, but if you ever have another chance to attend an Angie Head performance, take the opportunity.

Between heavy songs such as one by David Wilcox about a ten-year high school reunion with the lyrics "melting the shackles of pain [from high school] with tears," and a smooth rendition of "This House ain't no Home," Head was quite humorous. At one point she said, "I wrote a song – it's called tuning," as she adjusted the strings of her acoustic guitar.

Then she played "Avoiding the Cracks" in tribute to her mother. "It's a happy song, as you can tell by the major chords," Head noted with a smile. She talked about subjects like finding out that her mother is "cool." Cool enough to give rise to lies like, "They use to say, step on the cracks breaks Mama's back, so I'm avoiding the cracks."

This made the small crowd in the Campus Center Graduate Lounge laugh, but Head also wanted people to talk. She had everyone in the audience introduce themselves, and encouraged us to yell out any "cool shit" that we felt like sharing. This was a neat and unusual evening in a world that is often uptight and negative. When she played a country song, Head quipped, "Take a picture, this will probably be the only time you will ever see a black person playing country music."

Head also covered songs by Tracy Chapman, Fleetwood Mac and Katie Curtis. All the songs were super, but Head addmitted that she'd have to smoke a bunch of cigarettes to have Fleetwood Mac's "Landslide" come out right. Head's songs include great lyrics like, "Set free you jailed heart, release your shackled soul."

The audience enjoyed hearing Angie spout lines and songs from the movie The Sound of Music – she knows the whole musical by heart. Head announced that she is campaigning to use the word "folk" as a verb, the way the word "rock" has come to be used. So the next time you go to say, "That rocks!" join Angie and say, "That folks!"

Boys Don't Cry: A deeply affecting, brilliant film

By Paul Biba
Collegian Correspondent

I can't sleep. I lie awake at 4:15 a.m. and stare out of my bedroom window. It's raining outside. The raindrops fall like tears upon the soft cheek of the Earth. The surface splashed with the sadness that has come to overtake it. My eyes fill up with my own tears. My mind races with thoughts that I cannot control and wouldn't necessarily if I had the power. I think about the night that I just had and realize how different I was just one day ago. Not only as a gay man, but as a whole person in general. My friends, the tide has shifted and now a new person is emerging from the sea foam.

One day ago I was watching the Oscars on television. I'm sure that many of you witnessed it as well. For the most part I wasn't too impressed with the show. Once again it was too long and Billy Crystal just wasn't up to his standard humorous self.

Nevertheless, I was thrilled that American Beauty won Best Picture. I saw it not too long ago here on campus. I was absolutely taken aback by it and found it to be one of the most refreshing, creative, inspiring and ingenious films that I had seen in a long time. Kevin Spacey was once again brilliant in his role and I was ecstatic when he won Best Actor. He deserved that award just like, at the time, I felt Annette Bening did who starred opposite him. She lost to Hillary Swank for her work in Boys Don't Cry. I hadn't seen that one at the time.

So who is this Hillary Swank? Oh – that's right! She was in The Next Karate Kid and Beverly Hills 90210. Hasn't she come a long way!

What the hell did she pull off, going from Tori Spelling's level to winning Best Actress? It must have been some performance!

At the time, I had heard about Boys Don't Cry. Hillary played a female who was living her life as a male. The story of Brandon Teena, right? She falls in love with a girl and the movie depicts the story of what happens to "him" as he lives in this complicated lifestyle. I supposed it must be good if she won an Oscar for it. I thought I might like to see the movie. It was playing in Northampton at the North Pleasant St. Theater. I decided to gather up some friends and head off to the movies the next night.

Fast forward to several days later. I am in a state of complete shell shock. I've been speechless for over a half hour. Stunned at what I had just witnessed. Forever changed. I had just sat through two hours of the most disturbing yet absolutely overpowering movie of my life. I wept and wept in that small theater until I had the strength to stand and walk out. My friend Caroline wept just as hard and we carried each other out of the theater. All five of us men went were all completely different people than we were when we went in even though one friend had already seen it twice before. Swank, in my opinion, deserved every ounce of gold statue that she got on Oscar night. She gave the performance of her life when she depicted Brandon Teena.

A respect for her grew inside of me that is indescribable and I will forever be thankful and grateful to her for doing this movie. Cheers to the Academy for recognizing what I now see as brilliant work.

I suppose that I should explain the changes that I have gone through because of this movie. I dealt with courage and self worth. It relates to love for others and respect for all. It tackles a superficiality that once plagued my teenage mind. I have never been more proud to be gay than right now. I realize for the first time in my life that who I am is who I was before and who I will be tomorrow and the next day. I wouldn't trade it in for anything in the world. I am complete and self-accepting. I thought I was before, but realize now how wrong I was.

I love everyone to a certain extent [some more so than others]. The hate inside of me has changed to pity and a realization that a lack of education is to blame for bigotry and prejudice. That is something that can be changed. I think that it is asking too much to have people love me for being gay when I hate people for not being accepting. To receive is to give and to love is to feel it in return. I no longer care about looking a part. I have lost the urge to be silent with my family. I cannot go on pretending that my mother's denial of me being gay doesn't affect me; it does and always has.

Brandon Teena showed me that in this world there are people that don't understand others. As long as you fight for freedom to be yourself and never look down and accept failure, you have already won no matter what the outcome. She died, but because of her story, millions live more openly and are forever changed. I'm only one of them, but am proud to be so.

The film is ironically titled Boys Don't Cry. I did. I wept. My tears represent a cleansing of my mind, heart, and soul. I am forever changed and I have Brandon and Hillary to thank for that. My eyes have dried since last night, but the trail of tears has seeped into my skin and the memory of why those tears fell will forever be an impression on my face. A face that looked at the world a whole lot differently just one day ago.

Reform Rabbis affirm same-sex marriages

By Larry B. Stammer
Associated Press

In a new and dramatic break with the traditional understanding of biblical morality, rabbis of the largest Jewish movement in the United States last Wednesday declared that their members are free to officiate at same-sex unions.

A relationship between two Jewish men or two Jewish women is "worthy of affirmation through appropriate Jewish ritual," the resolution by the Central Conference of American Rabbis – the rabbinical arm of Reform Judaism – declared. The vote marked the first in a series of wrenching debates expected this year among both Christian and Jewish denominations over homosexuality.

Prior to last week's vote, the Unitarian Universalist Association and the United Church of Christ – both relatively small, traditionally liberal Christian denominations – were the only American religious bodies to formally approve having clergy officiate at same-gender unions. Later this year, the Presbyterian, United Methodist and Episcopal churches all face debates on the issue. Opposition to same-sex marriage is strong in each of those denominations.

Those debates come amid widespread arguments over same-sex unions in secular society as well. In recent weeks California voters overwhelmingly approved a ballot measure opposing same-sex marriages while legislators in Vermont moved toward establishing "civil unions" that stop just short of gay marriages.

Among Jews, the vote by the Reform rabbis follows years of sometimes contentious debate. Two years ago, the rabbis shelved a similar proposal, fearing a debate would be too divisive. This time, however, the voice vote to approve the resolution was overwhelming, following a closed-door debate that participants described as "very civil," but "passionate."

Reform Judaism claims some 1.5 million adherents and is the most liberal of the three main movements in American Judaism. Unlike the Roman Catholic Church, there is no Jewish hierarchy that can impose rules on all clergy, and some Reform rabbis already officiate at same-sex unions. But Wednesday's vote marked the first time that a rabbinical organization had faced the issue head-on.

"For the first time in history, a major rabbinical body has affirmed the Jewish validity of committed, same-gender relationships," said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the congregational arm of the Reform movement.

Supporters hailed the vote, which took place at the organization's annual meeting in Greensboro, N.C., as an overdue affirmation of the dignity of gay men and women as people created in the Image of God.

"Everything they've heard since the time they came to terms with the fact or recognized they were gay and lesbian has been negative. They were called substandard, sinful, abnormal, not whole," said Rabbi Paul Menitoff, the executive vice president of the Central Conference.

"It's no honor to be heterosexual, no sin to be homosexual," he said. "It's just who we are."

Calendar of Events

On Thursday, April 6, 2000, the LBGT Studies Lecture Series will be hosting Vikki Kirsch, Coordinator of the Women's Center at Quinsigamond Community College in Worcester. Kirsch will present: "Creating Mythologies as a Tool for Transformation: Natalie Barney and Renee Vivien Engage with Sappho and the Greek Goddesses." This event will take place at 12:30 p.m. in rooms 911-915.

On Friday April 7, 2000, LBGT Cafe will be featuring singer Jesse Zamek. Zamek is known as a musician who blends expressive and soulful singing with sophisticated songwriting, a commitment to justice, and unexpected whimsy. Her 1992 album "So Strong" made Ladyslipper's "1995 National List of Top 40 Bestselling Albums," in the company of k.d. lang and Ani DiFranco. Her 1995 release "Rhythms, Rhymes and Tides" has garnered international praise. This event will take place at 7:30 p.m. Friday April 7th, in the Graduate Lounge in the Campus Center. This event is co-sponsored by the Stonewall Center, the GLBT Graduate Student Organization, The UMass Arts Council, and the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth through a contract with the MA Dept. of Public Health.

On Wednesday, April 12, 2000, Mary Bonauto, lead counsel in the Vermont same sex partners case [Baker], will give a public talk, titled, "Marriage? Civil Union? Where is Vermont Leading the Country?" The lecture will take place at 7:30 p.m. in Thompson 102.

On Saturday, April 15th, 2000, there will be a Women's Dance and Social at the First Congregational Church at 43 Silver Street in Greenfield. All women are welcome. The dance will take place from 8:30 p.m. to midnight, and the cost will be $5. The church is located between Federal and High streets. The event is alcohol free and wheelchair accessible.

On April 15, 2000, Action For Campus Transformation: A Conference for Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay and Transgender People. The First Annual Western Massachusetts Safe College Conference of the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth, will take place at UMass. You can register on-line at: http://www.umass.edu/stonewall/online_registration.htm. The facilitators of the conference are looking for GLBT individuals who have been the target of violence or harassment due to their sexual orientation or gender expression who are willing to speak out about their experiences. If you are interested in giving a five-minute public testimony about your experiences at this conference, contact Idit Klein at the Stonewall Center at (413) 545-4824 or at idit@educ.umass.edu. Your story will help others come forward and put an end to anti-GLBT discrimination and violence on college campuses.

The Skulls
Directed by Rob Cohen with Joshua Jackson, Leslie Bibb, Paul Walker
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

The Skulls, much as its name would suggest, is a movie with a solid, well-defined structure, but almost complete-ly hollow inside. The movie takes almost excruciating pains to include all the elements for a successful film, but never connects them in a satisfactory manner. We have an interesting con-cept, a hero we can root for, a love interest, and even a villain, but The Skulls drags in the transition among them.

Lucas McNamara (Jackson) is a crew standout with twelve part-time jobs, yet he still owes Yale University in excess of $100,000. His one hope of going to law school is to join The Skulls, an elite and exclusive secret society with unimaginable power. As luck would have it, Luke gets in and meets Caleb Mandrake, played by genre veteran Paul Walker (Varsity Blues, She's All That).

Trouble arises though when Luke roommates Chloe (played by Leslie Bibb of TV's "Popular") and Will (Hill Harper) disapprove of his newfound secrecy. When Will shows up hanged one day, Luke must get to the bottom of The Skulls to solve the mystery.

What sounds like a story that should fall into place fairly easily – sus-pense, intrigue, mystery – turns into a sloppy, diluted, ineffectual drama. Steamy shower scene aside, the roman-tic relationship between Jackson and Bibb is so misplaced that it's comical. Any sense of mood or atmosphere which director Rob Cohen musters is thrown away at the feet of this ludi-crous sub-plot.

The Skulls as an organization also never seem as threatening as they are portrayed. The dark rooms and cav-ernous building are a good start, but the worst thing they ever do is back-stabbing politics – the likes of which can be seen on any good daytime soap opera. In fact, they pay for law school, hire prostitutes (at least that is the implication), and give you hot sports cars. That's not hellish; that's paradise.

The Skulls also wants to play up Luke's poor man's journey through a rich man's world, but here again it fails. Aside from a few scenes with Luke's friends, who resemble the Lone Gunmen from "The X-Files," there is no effort to develop any sort of motiva-tion here.

The film also leaves the most inter-esting character completely unexplored. That is the Senator from Virginia. He is Luke's champion, morally ethical (if there is such a thing in this movie), and out to destroy The Skulls. Yet, we never find out why. We just see him pulling a thousand magical deceptions throughout the movie without any explanation pointing to some kind of motivation.

The above are just some of the faults of the sloppy writing, which gives the audience more reason to route for the proposed villain (Mandrake) than the hero. Plus, when the movie's climatic scene is a duel (yes, that's right. Ten paces, turn and shoot) then you know something's amiss.

Even the lovable Joshua Jackson can't save the movie from its plight of inepitude. His character is never out right charming nor outright serious (the two things Jackson does well) and therefore he spends the movie wallow-ing in disbelief (as I did).

The Skulls is vaguely entertaining, if only to see how the slew of ridiculous plot devices will work themselves out, but beyond that, it's nothing more than silly. It has far too many holes and far too little depth to recommend as any-thing more than a casual viewing. C-

Equal and Cursed is really Blessed

Catatonia
Equally Cursed and Blessed
Atlantic Records

There's nothing like a well-crafted song, the sort of song that forces you to get up and dance, or beckons you to lie down, close your eyes, and let the music saturate your mind, smiling all the while. Collections of these songs are treasures whose discovery I eagerly anticipate, and Equally Cursed and Blessed, the new offering from popular British band Catatonia, has added another title to my list of such discoveries. The follow up to their 1998 U.K. double-plat-inum album International Velvet contains a wealth of excellent music, raw and melodic in turns, with the tenaci-ty and maturity of a band that knows exactly how to pack a song full of emotional energy and inviting sonic complexi-ty.

Catatonia is fronted by Cerys Matthews, a woman whose vocal talent defies description. It's ethereal; it's soulful; it's sweet one moment, seething the next. She's the rare sort of singer who doesn't take command of a song, but works within it, shaping her performance to the needs of the music. Her vocal range, and the variety of styles she can adopt, are impressive indeed and certainly the band's greatest asset.

Equally Cursed and Blessed alternates between ener-getic pop tunes, such as the irresistible "Londinium," and softer, more melodic songs, such as the stunning first track, "Dead From the Waist Down." The eleven tracks showcase the band's love of musical understatement, rely-ing on just a handful of guitars, and occasionally a string or organ arrangement, to shape a song. The result is an atmosphere of sincerity (this is not to say thinness, but tastefulness).

Highlights include the aforementioned "Londinium," "Bulimic Beats," a airy song built upon the beautiful strains of a harp and escalating with a stunning string arrange-ment and minor guitar embellishments, and "Valerian," punctuated by the European folk sounds of the hurdy-gurdy. Naming particular songs of such a consistent album, however, does a disservice to the remaining tracks – every song on the album will catch your attention in one way or another.

The U.S. release of Equally Cursed and Blessed contains two bonus tracks, "Road Rage" and "Mulder and Scully," the two successful singles from International Velvet. The straightforward guitar-pop tunes are welcome additions to the already wonderful lineup of the album proper (although "Dazed, Beautiful and Bruised," the eleventh track, makes a more suitable album closer). Anyone inter-ested in a collection of excellent songwriting, excellent singing, and excellent musical arrangement should give this album a thorough listen. A-

Catatonia is caught off guard for a photo shoot to promote its great album.

Nothing can stop Brockovich

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Erin Brockovich surprised movie-goes and continued to dominate the box office this weekend. The Julia Roberts film that has received quite a bit of critical acclaim brought in an estimated 14.2 million dollars this weekend in domestic gross. That brings its total to over 75 million dollars in the three weeks it has been playing.

Following Erin Brockovich in the top ten, were two new releases. Dreamworks's animated film The Road to El Dorado took in an impressive 12.5 million dollars, while the Joshua Jackson conspiracy thriller, The Skulls came in third with 11.4 million dollars. The only other new release this week, High Fidelity, finished in fifth place with 6.4 million.

Last week's action hit, Romeo Must Die, had another big weekend earning 9.7 million, while another film released last week, Final Destination took a pretty big hit despite terrific reviews.

Oscar winners also showed a substantial rise in box office gross this weekend. Best Picture winner American Beauty made 5.8 million dollars to put it in sixth place this week, and raised its overall total to 117 million dol-lars. The Cider House Rules finished in eleventh place with 2.2 million dollars, and elevated its total to 35.1 million dollars.

This upcoming weekend's releases include the highly anticipated Rules of Engagement, which stars Tommy Lee Jones and Samuel L. Jackson, and the World Championship Wrestling's not-so highly anticipated Ready to Rumble.

Northampton's Maggie's to party

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

If you are looking for a good time this Saturday night, I would suggest heading over to the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. While there you will be treated to a CD release party with The Maggies, who are set to debut their second proper release entitled Cryptic Valentine. I just had my own CD release party in my stereo and I must say it was a very good time. You really can't go wrong with light guitar pop, and The Maggies proved to be well-skilled in this genre.

The Northampton-based group has previously released one album, 1998's Homesick, as well as a variety of cassettes and appearances on compilations.

They list author Jonathan Lethem (Motherless Brooklyn) among their many fans, and have received critical acclaim not only locally but nationally as well in such publications as Alternative Press. The band consists of singer/guitarist/songwriter Philip Price, a veteran of many former bands and projects, bassist Max Germer, who started the band with Price back in the early 90s, drummer Stuart Wright, and their most recent recruit, Noho artist Adrian O'Carolan, who contributes additional vocals and synthesizer work.

The Maggies have no shortage of musical history among them and it shows in their seemingly effortless ability to craft a catchy melody and likeable pop ditty. "Nature's Afternoon," the opening track from Cryptic Valentine, is a perfect example of their simple yet inescapable guitar-driven sound. Some spacey synth sounds add kind of a sci-fi feel to the song, and Price's vocals, while fine on their own, are certainly enhanced by the female touch of O'Carolan's soothing whisper. More weird futuristic sounds can be found working their way into the old-school pop flavor of "Sara J" as well as the eclectic "Sleep, New Toy," and such sounds create a much more expansive feeling to the mostly laid-back proceedings. The tranquil flow of "B.M.G." is also noteworthy, and witness the playful back and forth between the guitars and vocals on "Solid Yellow Zero." "Dying In My Sleep" is quite rocking with some dirty down-tuned guitars, but if you want to slow things down try "We're Three" or "Dead Jones," the latter of which features some intriguing samples as well as vocals solely from O'Carolan.

My two favorite tracks from Cryptic Valentine are "Green" and "Long Dark See You." The sing-a-long potential of "Green" is very high, and "Long Dark See You" is just great. I love this song. The layered sounds and somber chorus will win over anyone, believe me. If these two songs weren't enough to get you hooked, just check out the cool cover art from Jim Woodring. While you're at it, www.themaggies.com should have all the information you crave about this band, and has a very pleasing and easy-to-navigate layout.

The Maggies already has quite a legion of dedicated fans, and after hearing Cryptic Valentine it is easy to see why. Stop by the Iron Horse this Saturday night and chances are you will soon count yourself among them.

The inevitable question of comedy: South Park against Monty Python

By Diane Werts
Newsday

What a silly, smart, sentimental, subversive, superb week of comedy! The fourth season premiere of "South Park" Wednesday night on Comedy Central re-establishes the adult cartoon as the cleverest, sharpest, biggest bang-per-second jestfest on the tube.

And A&E's Sunday night "Biography" for the 30th anniversary of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" recapitulates the whole jolly "Life of Python" over two hours of choice clips, revealing reminiscences, and a pervasive spirit of such fond warmth that it's like sitting beside the roaringest fire on a snowy Christmas morning.

Am I going overboard? It's easy, considering the quality and, yes, class of these two offerings. And it's handy, too, considering what "South Park" creators Trey Parker and Matt Stone have to say about "Python" on Sunday's "Biography." They're not just young enough (at 30 and 28, respectively) to be the literal children of the 60-ish Python guys. They're also obviously their spiritual children.

It's no coincidence the kids portrayed on Parker and Stone's racy "South Park" are about eight, the age at which Parker says he first encountered "Python," the parent-banned cult comedy of the '70s.

"The irony is, for us that was the dirty little show that the kids weren't supposed to watch," he says. "Of course, we would all go to school the next day and talk about it." Stone extols its comic sensibility: "I felt like it gave me some kind of edge on humor that other people didn't see."

Some things never change. "Other people" still don't get "South Park." They think it's just a bunch of dirty words and sick jokes. Ha! Wednesday's episode is a dizzying cornucopia of ideas, techniques, spoofs, social commentary and "infinite alternate realities."

That's what existential Kyle gets into, reading up on space-time, quantum theory, Taoism and Descartes after the boys mix it up with the mob when they learn the truth about the tooth fairy and start running a racket to make enough money for a Sega Dreamcast. Richard Belzer shows up (vocally), we see Cartman's hair (a lot), we learn way too much about his mother's (uh) "employment," we go to an American Dental Association convention and the guys go Superfly. Don't forget the consequent lessons. Should parents lie to kids? (Probably not.) Are Moses and Abrahám real? (Probably.) And what about Dan Rather? (No comment.)

There's even a reference to a be-gowned Cartman as a "Jennifer Lopez nightmare"! So how long was Trey Parker planning his Oscar entrance in that revealing green dress anyway?

"South Park" is so shrewd, it is almost (as Cartman would say) "beyond rational thought." As is the notion that Stone and particularly main director/writer Parker can continue to work at so high a creative level and so busy an output. Their movie "South Park: Bigger, Longer and Uncut" was last year's most hilariously original concoction, with a strong social message exquisitely executed, and the finest movie musical in eons, to boot.

Parker not only directed the movie, he co-wrote it and co-produced it (with Stone), co-composed the parody-perfect songs (with Marc Shaiman), and did half the voices. (He's Stan and Cartman, among others; Stone does Kyle and more.) He and Stone don't get near enough credit for their vocal acting, which exhibits more impeccable timing and sheer talent than all the Emmy-winning "emoting" you want to name.

Of course, it took decades for the "Monty Python" guys to get their props. Even 30 years later, "Biography" guest host Eric Idle wonders Sunday of the vintage BBC comedy: "The most vitally important and significant show of the 20th century? Or just a bunch of stupid Englishmen dressing up in silly clothes?"

team four years ago as a walk-on, and showed flashes of offensive brilliance in the Minutewomen's 9-6 1999 campaign. This season, Miele has put the ball in the net in each of the previous two games, and might sneak up on Dartmouth as lower profile, yet just as prolific, scorer.

"Melissa Miele has really continued her play from last year, she's playing well defensively, and she's putting the ball in the cage. [She had] two goals against Holstra," Barnes said. "She takes care of the ball and chooses shots wisely. When she shoots, she finishes – her shooting percentage is one of the highest on the team."

It is perhaps on the defensive side of the ball that Miele will be called upon more often against the Big Green gunners. The Minutewomen are as equipped as anyone to deal with an attack as respected as Dartmouth, boasting much of the same cast that ranked as the No. 6 scoring defense in the nation last year, as well as the country's best goaltender in 1999, Jen Nardi. Not to be overlooked on the defensive unit are three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young and stingy defender Jessica Passanese, who also is hitting stride.

While a UMass victory today isn't impossible, it will involve the Maroon and White running on all cylinders.

"They're beatable, but we need to play a great game – and we have the potential to," Barnes said. "It would be an upset, but anything could happen."

Minutewomen don't appear to have an Achilles Heel for the opposition to attack. Their biggest limiting factor then, especially against an opponent like Brown, may be overconfidence and plain old complacency.

"We've learned from the past that when we get into a situation with an opponent like Brown, we often go in thinking that there's no way we can lose," Clement said. "We end up making a lot of little mistakes and not playing as well as we know we can. Brown is making adjustments every time we play them, so we can't take them lightly."

And if the Minutewomen do need a motivating factor for tonight's game after all, they may as well face up to one cold, hard reality: they are no longer the undisputed top dogs of East Coast water polo. That distinction now belongs to Princeton, and the only way for the Maroon and White to reclaim its crown is to play hard game in and game out along the road to this year's Eastern Championship.

"We know that we're no longer the No. 1 team in the East," said McOsker, who has been forced to worry about more than water polo with his wife expecting.

"But we're not concerned with that now, as long as we finish on top at the end of the season. I keep telling that the team that this is a building recess."

UM needs uplifting match

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

You can't say they haven't tried.

When the members of the Massachusetts men's tennis team was plagued by a tsunami of injuries, they worked on their endurance and physical fitness, plodding through an enhanced workout program created by head coach Judy Dixon.

When the Minutemen suffered a tough loss to the formidable Brown University, they had a session with a sports psychologist, and came out upbeat and determined, with renewed energy and expectations.

When the squad's loss column began to expand with a disturbing rapidity and consistency, the coaches fiddled with the line-up in an attempt to breathe new life into what had become a stale and stagnant singles roster.

And what do the Maroon and White have to show for their efforts? A 2-9 spring record, a 7-9 season record, and a wealth of dashed hopes.

Today, the Minutemen hope to ride the tide of changing fortunes as they play host to the University of Hartford to kick off a two-match homestand, the squad's first of the spring season.

On the eve of the team's inaugural home match of the spring campaign, assistant head coach Scott Wilkins was a study in frustration and optimism as he mused about lost expectations, missed opportunities, and the chance for redemption.

"I knew the schedule would be difficult, but we could be doing better," Wilkins offered. "I would say George Washington, Bloomsburg, Villanova, and maybe Lamar are four matches that we lost that on a given day we could have won. It's been rough, but with some of our matches coming up, it looks like we should be able to come out of our hole."

The squad's first opportunity to crawl out of the cellar will be against a strong but vulnerable Hartford lineup. Wilkins hopes that the confidence boost that accompanies home-court advantage will provide a much-needed crutch for his hobbling team. The Minutemen were home-court heroes last fall, when they went 3-0 and clinched their biggest win of the season, a 6-1 victory over archrival UConn.

"They might not come out and say it right now," said Wilkins. "But when the time comes and we get out to the courts, I think there will be a better and more positive atmosphere."

Sophomore Steve Prisco will look to snap his three-match losing streak in the No. 1 singles slot, most likely against Hartford's Predrag Zlatkovic.

"Obviously, Steve's the best player on our team, but match in, match out, he's going to be playing top-notch people," said Wilkins. "Sometimes, we can't count on him or expect him to win [because of the high level of competition]. It's the other guys down low, it's those guys that really need to step up."

In particular, strong performances will be expected from junior Fabien Rabanal, and senior co-captains Bo Navarro and Parsa Samii, in the Nos. 2, 3, and 4 slots, respectively.

"Hartford is strong up top. We should get them with our depth, but we have to prove it, we can't just say it," Wilkins noted. "It's a winnable match, but they're formidable enough where they're not going to roll over on us. I think we can turn it around right now. We need to come together and start something new."

"Back then we laughed and had a lot of fun, but up here it's hard work to play," he said.

His initial plan after high school was to attend Boston College with friend Elson Tyler, now a Miami Hurricane, but it never happened. Instead, DePina regards former UMass assistant coach John Robic as a crucial factor in picking the Minutemen. Robic, though, has since left the program to become the head coach at Youngstown State in Ohio. It left a slight void.

DePina said Robic was the one who kept in touch with the point guard as his high school career and college decision-making came close to an end.

Reunited with high school teammate and friend Monty Mack, DePina believes that having close ties to certain members on the team helps him when his play is struggling.

"Me, Shannon and Monty hang out a lot together off the court," he said. "If I am frustrated on the court, they are there to help me through whatever."

DePina plans to workout all summer, whether it is here at school or some place else.

"I might go play overseas but I'm not sure yet," DePina said. "I might also stay at school, take classes and work, but I'll always be working out."

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're after something or someone more steady and dependable – but you've got to prove yourself worthy of it. Don't be flighty!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're going to have to make amends today if you expect to start over with a friend or loved one. Make sure you don't miss your chance!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A trip down memory lane is likely to yield at least one major surprise today which could, in the end, bring you face to face with yourself!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take care that the words between you and a rival don't get heated at this time. You can't afford to threaten what is a valuable relationship.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You can contribute something important throughout the day, and it's not likely that anyone will try to stand in your way.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be pressed for time today, but by working closely with another, you can make the most of each and every opportunity.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may uncover a secret that a loved one has been trying to keep from you. Today, you'll suddenly find yourself in a controlling position.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're falling into a personal phase marked by self-interest and driving ambition. Others may call you selfish now, and there's something to it!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Your schedule may be changing at this time, as a result of more duties and greater authority on the job. You must be flexible at home, too.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Keep things casual and low-key today, at least as they are starting out. Later on, with planning and preparation, you can raise the stakes.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Others are likely to gravitate toward you today, not simply because you have proven to be the voice of a popular viewpoint.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Though you're well known for being positive and light-hearted, you may fall into a funk today as a result of an opportunity that passed you by.

Quote of the Day

"If anything in life is certain; if history has taught us anything it's that you can kill anyone."

Soul Searching

Jonathan DePina is desperate for some confidence on the hardwood

By Andrew Allegro
Collegian Correspondent

Massachusetts basketball guard Jonathan DePina kept the phone next to him as he studied an NBA game on the television.

Sitting on the edge of his bed in J.Q.A. residence hall, DePina, a junior, maintained his mellow demeanor... even though it seemed as though the phone rang every five minutes. Almost nonchalantly, he patiently deferred each caller until the game ended. For a number of reasons, basketball needed his undivided attention.

In the past three years, Minutemen fans have reluctantly filled the seats of the Mullins Center, mostly because the Minutemen have only earned two NCAA tournament berths in the last four years.

DePina understood why fans might have lost confidence in his team. The lack of faith and the scrutiny, he said, rubbed off on the players.

Of all Minutemen, DePina especially knows what it's like to have little confidence. And whether its incessant phone calls or lack of playing time, DePina knows what it feels like to be bothered.

"Rock bottom," DePina said, describing his confidence level last season. "I feel very uncomfortable on the court, sometimes that I don't even know when to shoot."

DePina's Minutemen suffered another uphill season in the Atlantic 10 (17-16), ending on a sour note by losing to Siena in the first round of the National Invitational Tournament.

Early preseason predictions suggested that UMass would be running an up-tempo offense – a perfect fit for the five-foot-10 reserve point guard. Coach Bruiser Flint would need to rotate players to sustain the high-energy pace.

But when the Minutemen didn't run, DePina struggled to find his role on the team, scoring only three points per game.

"I thought we were running at the beginning of the season. But we don't run-and-gun," he said, recognizing that he often didn't fit into the UMass style of play.

DePina's quickness and point guard abilities were overlooked at many times. His game lacked the intensity and courageousness for which he was once well known. While unable to score, DePina has played outstanding defense for the past three years, covering the likes of Tyson Wheeler, Shawnta Rodgers and Pepe Sanchez, all of who have – or are expected to – play at the next level.

In the face of adversity, DePina must now contend with expectations for next season, his senior year. He feels that he must seriously rededicate himself, making team play his primary concern, and pushing his personal feelings to secondary importance.

"I'll do whatever the coaches tell me to do," DePina said. "I'll also try to play a little of my game... just giving it a shot at times."

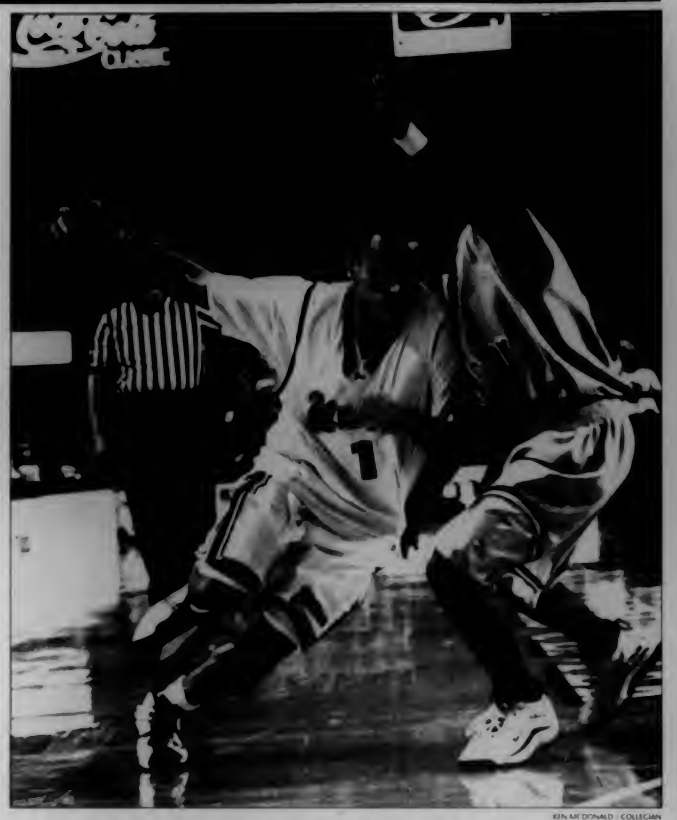
Part of the reason for DePina's obscurity on the bench is the emergence of sophomore point guard Shannon Crooks, a St. John's transfer and close friend to DePina.

"I wasn't mad when Shannon came," DePina said. "I just kept playing and trying my hardest in practice."

Witness to the open lack of confidence, UMass center Kitwana Rhymer believes DePina's play is truly affected by his minutes. Rhymer, who played very little his freshman year, could empathize.

"It kills a guy's confidence when he plays twenty minutes one game and six minutes the next," Rhymer said.

There were times when DePina thought about leaving. He contemplated transferring from UMass last year right around the time both Rafael Cruz and Ajmal Basit left the team for other schools. DePina, though, stuck in by returning for a third year. Quietly, Flint hoped that DePina would.



"Coach Flint didn't want anyone to leave, but he never said it," DePina recalls. "He was there to help me through my decision."

Flint was told recently by administration that he was allowed to come back as coach next season, even though his last two years have been tough ones. With the roles slightly reversed this year, DePina was happy about the athletic department's decision to keep Flint.

"I'm happy for him. It proves he is a good guy and a good coach," he said.

Minutewomen set to tackle Ivy

Senior defender Sarah McNabb and the UMass women's lacrosse team looks to make the Big Green feel a bit blue today.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After a stretch of four days in which the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played three games, the Minutewomen finally got a rest.

A rest is exactly what UMass (2-4) will need as it hosts No. 3 Dartmouth (4-1 overall, 3-0 Ivy League) today. The rigorous schedule didn't affect the Maroon and White in the win-loss column until Saturday, when they dropped a close outing at Hofstra, 9-7.

"We've had three days off since our last game, and we're definitely well-rested for this next game," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "Dartmouth is great. It's about playing the best competition – it helps us build toward the Atlantic 10 schedule."

The Big Green will serve as the last tune-up game before the A-10 slate begins this weekend, when the Minutewomen travel to play St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

Still, "tune-up" is a liberal way to describe the nation's third-ranked team. The powerful Dartmouth squad most recently saw action on April 1, when it tore through Brown, 18-4. The average margin of victory in the Big Green's four wins is an enormous 12 goals, with Dartmouth never dropping below an output of 14. The unit's only loss came at the hands of the defending National Champion Maryland.

Barnes is most worried about one player: Jacque Weitzel. The Big Green's big scorer has yet to leave a game this season without at least a hat trick, and has three games with five or more goals. In Dartmouth's season opener against New Hampshire, Weitzel hit the back of the opposing net seven times.

"She plays on the U.S. developmental team," Barnes added. "She's a talented player."

Barnes will count on a couple of proven guns and a couple of players that could slowly move to center stage to provide offense to counteract the relentless Green Hurry. Seniors Rebecca Minaker and Stephanie Pavlick will come into the game as marked women for Massachusetts. Both players are established scorers, with 12 and nine points, respectively, to lead the team.

Junior attack Kara DePaula is a ticking time bomb, seemingly a hair away from exploding into a barrage of goals at any given time. The graduate of Saratoga Springs High has shown the potential to be a legitimate sniper, but has until now been a step away.

"Kara is solid and steady," Barnes said. "When Kara plays her game, she really contributes to the team."

Senior defender Melissa Miele will quietly join the trio as a potent offensive threat, as well. The Pennsylvania native came to the

There is little reason to believe that tonight's water polo match at the Smith Swim Center in Providence will be anything but a complete and utter massacre.

At one end of the pool will be the host Bears of Brown, barely keeping their heads above water at 7-7 on the season.

Fifty meters of pool distance and a world of polo prowess away will be No. 11 Massachusetts, flaunting an impressive 21-6 overall mark and an unblemished 5-0 record in combat with Brown this season.

While those numbers alone tell a story of disparity, a closer look at some of the actual scores from those five games makes the image that much more gruesome.

March 4 in Providence: 16-5, UMass. Exactly two weeks later in Amherst: 16-6, Minutewomen. Four days after that, also at UMass: 14-2 in favor of the home team. Three days later at Yale: 12-4, Maroon and White.

So how on Earth does tonight's Goliath even get the least bit motivated for such a seemingly outclassed David?

"When you've beaten a team that many times and by that many points, it's hard to get that level of nervousness and intensity that you get in a big game," said senior All-American Marci Hupp. "But we're at a point in the season where we try to use each game to work on our specific weaknesses."

Ironically enough, pinpointing an actual weakness of this team may be the most difficult step in the entire process. Coach Dan McOsker's squad has brought a world-class level of play to the pool against a wide range of opponents this season, from New England rivals Brown, Yale and Dartmouth to Eastern nemesis Princeton to West Coast powerhouses UC-Davis, Pacific and San Jose State.

Offense for the Maroon and White has come in waves from athletes up and down the roster. While seniors Hupp, Claudia Clement, Katie Grogan and Laurie Edwards have stepped up as expected in the scoring column, other key contributions to the team's total effort have come from players with all different levels of experience.

Junior Sarah Newell, sophomore Anne Dettloff and freshman Amy Black have all created a stir with individual talents that perfectly complement those of their teammates.

"Sarah has amazing swimming skills, and she's able to move quickly and react to other players," Hupp said. "Anne has improved immensely this season, to the point where every time she gets in the pool, she gives her heart and soul to going after everything. Amy is so smart in the pool that she's become like our secret weapon; she's not afraid to step up, take the shots and get involved in the offense."

While the team has absolutely exploded offensively, both coach and players are quick to point out that defense has been what has separated UMass from its opponents. Edwards and her field comrades have all but shut down opposing offenses all season, and on the rare instances that teams have been able to mount an attack, they've run into goalkeeper extraordinaire Dana Sinkwich.

"Dana plays a huge role in giving us what we need to be a great defensive team," Edwards said.

Baseball to settle late-game woes

By Matthew Despres

It takes no more than a quick glance, even for the most casual of observers, to realize that the 2000 season for the Massachusetts baseball team has been an inconsistent one.

A six game slide to start the season, an eight game winning streak, and a handful of inconsistent performances since have marked the Minuteman schedule, and left the team struggling to pull away from the .500 mark. Head coach Mike Stone will look to get his team going today, as the Minutemen travel to Central Connecticut State University to face the Blue Devils in an afternoon contest.

The trip to New Britain, Conn. may produce one of the biggest games of the season for the Minutemen (10-9, 2-1 Atlantic 10), who need to find a comfortable rhythm before Virginia Tech arrives this weekend for a three-game series. The solution, as has been the case for the whole season, is for UMass to find a balance of offense and pitching that will provide a solid nine innings of work.

For the most part, it has been the pitching staff that has been the glue that holds games together for UMass, particularly in late innings. The Minuteman tendency to put up big numbers early and then cool off has left the fate of many a game in the arms of one individual.

On Monday against the Dayton Flyers, pitcher Craig Szado gave up four runs and struck out seven batters in seven plus innings of work, a strong effort for which he took the loss. His performance came two days after another strong outing from senior Travis Veracka, who pitched an eight hit, seven-strikeout, complete game. The performances by Veracka and Szado were similar, the difference lying in the offense, where Veracka benefited from 15 runs in the first five innings.

On the surface it's hard to find fault in posting 15 runs in a game, but when all 15 come in the first five innings, it's only natural to wonder where the team disappeared to in the remaining four. To relieve the pitching staff, the Minutemen will look to a few key individuals to help spread the wealth more evenly.

Sophomore Aaron Senez has arguably been the best hitter for UMass this season. The shortstop boasts a .370 batting average, along with 10 doubles and 16 runs batted in. Catcher Chris Morgan has emerged from behind the plate as a solid hitter, currently batting second on the team with a .369 average and two homeruns. Rounding out the top three offensive forces for UMass is sophomore Mike Kulak, who is batting a healthy .367 with eight runs scored.

The game against the Blue Devils is slated for a 3 p.m. start.

Soul Searching

Jonathan DePina is desperate for some confidence on the hardwood

By Andrew Allegro
Collegian Correspondent

Massachusetts basketball guard Jonathan DePina kept the phone next to him as he studied an NBA game on the television.

Sitting on the edge of his bed in LGA residence hall, DePina, a junior, maintained his mellow demeanor… even though it seemed as though the phone rang every five minutes. Almost nonchalantly, he patiently deferred each caller until the game ended. For a number of reasons, basketball needed his undivided attention.

In the past three years, Minutemen fans have reluctantly filled the seats of the Mullins Center, mostly because the Minutemen have only earned two NCAA tournament berths in the last four years.

DePina understood why fans might have lost confidence in his team. The lack of faith and the scrutiny, he said, rubbed off on the players.

Of all Minutemen, DePina especially knows what it's like to have little confidence. And whether its incessant phone calls or lack of playing time, DePina knows what it feels like to be bothered.

"Rock bottom," DePina said, describing his confidence level last season. "I feel very uncomfortable on the court, sometimes that I don't even know when to shoot."

DePina's Minutemen suffered another uphill season in the Atlantic 10 (17-16), ending on a sour note by losing to Siena in the first round of the National Invitational Tournament.

Early preseason predictions suggested that UMass would be running an up-tempo offense — a perfect fit for the five-foot-10 reserve point guard. Coach Bruiser Flint would need to rotate players to sustain the high-energy pace.

But when the Minutemen didn't run, DePina struggled to find his role on the team, scoring only three points per game.

"I thought we were running at the beginning of the season. But we don't run-and-gun," he said, recognizing that he often didn't fit into the UMass style of play.

DePina's quickness and point guard abilities were overlooked at many times. His game lacked the intensity and courageousness for which he was once well known. While unable to score, DePina has played outstanding defense for the past three years, covering the likes of Tyson Wheeler, Shawnta Rodgers and Pepe Sanchez, all of who have – or are expected to – play at the next level.

In the face of adversity, DePina must now contend with expectations for next season, his senior year. He feels that he must seriously rededicate himself, making team play his primary concern, and pushing his personal feelings to secondary importance.

"I'll do whatever the coaches tell me to do," DePina said. "I'll also try to play a little of my game… just giving it a shot at times."

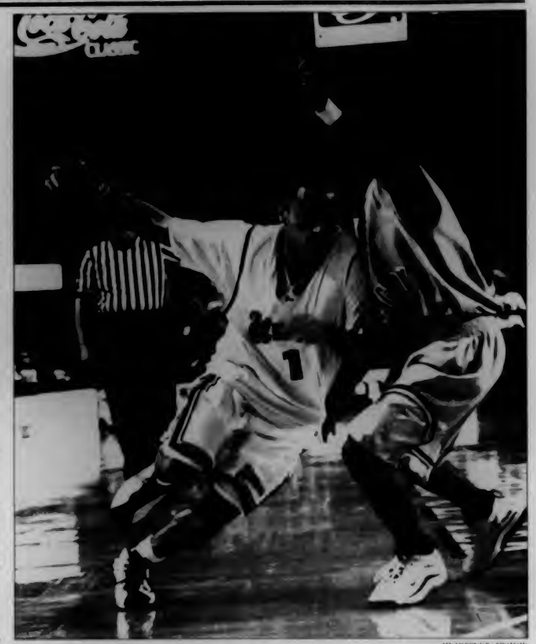
Part of the reason for DePina's obscurity on the bench is the emergence of sophomore point guard Shannon Crooks, a St. John's transfer and close friend to DePina.

"I wasn't mad when Shannon came," DePina said. "I just kept playing and trying my hardest in practice."

Witness to the open lack of confidence, UMass center Kitwana Rhymer believes DePina's play is truly affected by his minutes. Rhymer, who played very little his freshman year, could empathize.

"It kills a guy's confidence when he plays twenty minutes one game and six minutes the next," Rhymer said.

There were times when DePina thought about leaving. He contemplated transferring from UMass last year right around the time both Rafael Cruz and Ajmal Basit left the team for other schools. DePina, though, stuck in by returning for a third year. Quietly, Flint hoped that DePina would.



"Coach Flint didn't want anyone to leave, but he never said it," DePina recalls. "He was there to help me through my decision."

Flint was told recently by administration that he was allowed to come back as coach next season, even though his last two years have been tough ones. With the roles slightly reversed this year, DePina was happy about the athletic department's decision to keep Flint.

"I'm happy for him. It proves he is a good guy and a good coach," he said.

But UMass wasn't supposed to be this way for DePina. When DePina left South Boston High, he was recognized as one of the top guards coming out of Massachusetts, earning the Boston Globe Super Team and Boston Herald honors, along with averaging 26 ppg and four steals his

After a stretch of four days in which the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played three games, the Minutewomen finally got a rest.

A rest is exactly what UMass (2-4) will need as it hosts No. 3 Dartmouth (4-1 overall, 3-0 Ivy League) today. The rigorous schedule didn't affect the Maroon and White in the win-loss column until Saturday, when they dropped a close outing at Hofstra, 9-7.

Senator removed from SGA meeting

Document revealed

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Seth Avakian, the Student Government Association Trustee, said that last night's SGA meeting, despite a negative beginning, ended on a positive note after the Senate passed four motions.

However, it was the negative beginning that will likely be remembered; it took Zachary Spilman only nine minutes to be both warned and then asked to leave the Senate chamber.

Mikale Billard, Speaker of the SGA, hammered his gavel to begin the meeting at 7:20 p.m. last night. Spilman immediately said that he had a point of order; a memo sent to campus activities that identified Billard as the current president of the SGA. Jeff Howe won an election last week and began his second term as president at the meeting.

Spilman said that because of the memo, Billard couldn't be recognized as the speaker.

"I've called the meeting to order," Billard said. "And you may sit down."

Soon thereafter, Spilman began to distribute copies of the memo (see right) before being warned to stop by Billard as he was interrupting announcements. Spilman continued to distribute the document and was asked to leave the meeting at 7:29 p.m. Spilman sat down.

"Would you like to leave? I've warned you, now I've asked you to leave," Billard said.

"No," Spilman said.

Somebody called out that the Senate needed a sergeant-at-arms, and Billard threatened to call the police. Spilman stood and continued to walk around the meeting, exchanged words with Billard and was pulled from the room by Mike McCarthy, an at-large Senator from Orchard Hill.

"I didn't want him to get arrested," McCarthy said. "The SGA isn't worth getting arrested for."

Spilman re-entered the room several minutes later, taking a seat at the meeting. Lloyd Henley, the Campus Center Night Manager, who said that that most he had ever had to do at an SGA meeting was watch the door, was asked to escort Spilman from the meeting.

"That was the first time I ever had to ask someone to leave," Henley said.

As Spilman walked out, the chamber clapped and Avakian screamed "don't come back" at the departing senator.

Avakian, while making his comments at the meeting, said that he appreciated the senators that "got it."

"But there are some out there that don't get it, some of you don't understand what we are all about. Some of you are mad, or jealous, or maybe upset at 'mommy' toilet training you too early. You divide us and destroy and you have no business in this meeting," Avakian said.

Howe went on, saying that Spilman had long "had a problem with me."

"For whatever his reasons, he was completely inappropriate tonight. He chose an approach that does nothing for students. This will probably be cause for students to look at us poorly."

The document that sparked the argument, the memo that Spilman presented and distributed, went unexplained. Howe said that Spilman probably found it in the trash.

"Probably found it next to Sandra's [Brookley is the SGA's Secretary of the Register's] desk in the trash. It was a memo about an RSO that was trying to be recognized. We started it, then threw it out and figured it would stay there," Howe said. "Of course, we don't know who'll be going through the trash."

But Spilman said it was given to him by an officer of the SGA whom he wouldn't identify.

Brookley, for her part, said that she had been working on the memo, had planned to change the title after Billard's name, but then quit when she realized the document wouldn't matter anyway. She likened it to turning in a paper that was half-finished.

Protest may arise for Ollie

By Jason Trenkle

The University of Massachusetts Republican Club is hosting a visit by Colonel Oliver North today at noon in the Fine Arts Center Lobby, but increased security measures have been taken to ensure that people protesting North's visit will not disrupt his speech.

Flyers were distributed across campus this week calling students to stage a "walkout" in their classes to gather and protest North's visit. The speech on the flyers accuse North of being a "terrorist" and lay claim that he "killed innocent Nicaraguans." In addition, the flyers refer to him as a "radical right-wing zealot, a perjurer, a liar and a racist oppressor. A larger picture portrays North as taking an oath with the words, "Hail Reagan" in front of his face. The individual or group of people responsible for distributing the flyers have not been identified.

Republican Club President Michael Rossettie said he would rather have been contacted by the group behind the flyers prior to the event, but because they didn't, he said they have been required to increase the security to protect North. According to him, they have paid $220 dollars for a full-time police officer at the event and there will be an additional four to five police officers in street clothing. Twenty Republican Club members will also be staffing the event and working crowd control.

"Between the police and the club we feel we have adequate security," Rossettie said. "Furthermore, we are not allowing any sort of signs on sticks to come into the event, whether they be pro-Ollie or anti-Ollie."

Rossettie stated that the police are concerned about the Collegian article that was printed yesterday, stating that they believe the article will only help to increase the amount of protesting at the North event. However, Rossettie added that as much as he would rather have no one protest Ollie North, he said it is a person's individual right.

"If people choose to protest the Oliver North event, that's their constitutional right," Rossettie said. "I may disagree with them but I'm not going to fight their constitutional right."

In addition, he stated that they have reserved the grassy space in the middle of Haigis Mall for protestors to rally.

North, a former high-ranking defense official under Ronald Regan was involved with the Iran-Contra affair and with American military operations in Central American countries.

The event is free to the public and there will be priority seating available to VIP guests. This is the first time that the Republican Club could afford to have North come speak and they received monetary support from a conservative group known as "Young Americans."

North's visit to campus will be shortened by his need to return to Washington, D.C. in the evening to film his television show, "Equal Time," which airs on MSNBC.

Nobel Prize winner entertains crowd

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, Nobel Prize winning poet and current best-selling author Seamus Heaney read selections of his extensive work to a crowded Campus Center Auditorium.

Long time friend and UMass professor Peggy O'Brien introduced Heaney praising his resilience, acknowledging his capacity for human warmth, and outlining the Irish tradition of excellence started by Yeats and continued now by Heaney.

Upon taking the podium, Heaney compared this experience to a commencement address which he had at the University of North Carolina in 1996. His one piece of advice for the graduates and for the audience was "The secret to art and life is getting started, keeping going, and getting started again."

Heaney based his selections for the session on this philosophy, starting with pieces from Death of a Naturalist, his first book, then moving on to some sonnets, and concluding with selections from his recent translation of Beowulf, which currently sits at number 13 on The New York Times best-sellers list. Beowulf has also recently won the prestigious Whitbread Book of the Year award.

The poet explained that "Personal Helicon," the first of his selections, was an allusion to Mt. Helicon, referenced by Homer, and the place where the mythical Pegasus left his footprint to create a magical spring. The poem speaks of Heaney's youth and his love for the wells and pumps where he grew up.

"Sunlight," the next selection, is also a poem with inspired by water pumps. Heaney paused briefly afterwards to explain how poets strive for a fusion of the dream world and practical relevance to their readers.

Heaney then revealed how "Station Island," from which he read a part of Section 7, got its name. It is thought that St. Patrick once took a three day sabbatical on an island to simulate Christ's three days of temptation in the desert. So, modern day Catholics take pilgrimages to this island, and as a part of the pilgrimage, they perform exercises or stations. After reading the poem, Heaney echoed Aristotle's Poetics in questioning the distinction between history and art.

Heaney then read three of his sonnets, including "May Evening" and "The Skylight," which were all written at Glanmoore Cottage. In this way, Heaney said that he felt some kinship with the romantic poet Wordsworth, who spent a year writing at Dove Cottage.

Heaney moved on to some brief excerpts from Lightenings. This work is a collection of four sets of twelve, twelve-line poems. The narrative structure of the work recalls Dante's Divine Comedy, a work with which Heaney has also done work.

One of the evening's highlights was the lively and humorous excerpt from The Real Names. As Heaney explained, the poems are both an exploration of reality versus imagination and an examination of Shakespeare's effect on people's lives. Real Names takes people familiar to Heaney and places them inside of various Shakespearean plays, including The Tempest, MacBeth and Hamlet.

From his best-selling Beowulf, Heaney read three pieces, including the famous "Father's Sonnet." The poet concluded the evening with "Sinkhaven and the Blackbird," appropriately a poem about eternal life.

The Seamus Heaney reading was a continuance of the Trois Lecture Series, named for Frederick S. Trois, former head of student affairs at UMass. The series has previously included Nobel laureates like Nadine Gordimer and Wole Soyinka.

Escaped Tibetan monk Gyatso to speak Friday

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow night, the University of Massachusetts will host a lecture to be given by Palden Gyatso, a Tibetan monk, who escaped Tibet after 33 years of imprisonment and torture.

Accompanying his lecture, Gyatso will display a selection of implements of torture used on him and other prisoners that he smuggled out of the prison when he was released.

Gyatso became a monk at the age of 18, and in 1959 was arrested and subsequently imprisoned without trial for his role in the Tibetan National Uprising that took place March 10 in Lhasa, Tibet.

For the next 33 years Gyatso suffered all sorts of torments, including torture, thought reform, and constant interrogation.

In his lecture, Gyatso is expected to depict his experiences as a prisoner and describe the actions taking by Chinese guards, such as torture techniques, starvation and forced false confessions of other prisoners, including himself.

According to Gyatso, Chinese prison guards employed the use of saw-like knives and 70,000 volt shock guns to force the confessions.

"I think it will tell us that this is a serious issue and that there are still prisoners there that we can't forget," Matt Kozuch, the organizer of the event, said.

He called Gyatso "living proof of what students can do," citing that Gyatso had been released in 1992 through a letter writing campaign after Amnesty International took him on as a prisoner of conscience.

Kozuch called this lecture "a matter of survival for Tibetans."

Gyatso says his faith is the true reason for his survival, stating, "my religious training brought me peace of mind."

"Physical restraints were only the outward sign of imprisonment. I still had the power to give my thoughts free rein," Gyatso said, and after 33 years of imprisonment, Gyatso came out with an even stronger desire for a free Tibet.

Without any true television coverage of the situation in Tibet, Gyatso's lecture is expected to be of prime importance.

Since his release in 1992, Gyatso has worked towards the exposure of the violence that runs rampant in the Chinese occupied Tibet.

He has testified as a witness in the UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, as well as spoken to the United States Congress about the atrocities suffered by Tiberan political prisoners.

In 1996 he made the 300-mile journey from the Chinese Embassy in Washington, D.C. to the United Nations in New York City. He has also received the John Humphrey Human Rights Award.

According to Kozuch, Gyatso's story "goes beyond the Hollywood image of Tibet."

"This is not Seven Years in Tibet," he said.

The lecture, sponsored by Students For Free Tibet and the Tibetan Student Association, will be at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Alternative spring breaks reflect

By Joseph Collins
Collegian Correspondent

Last night in the basement of the Wesley United Methodist Church, the Inter-Religious Project's alternative spring break groups gathered for an evening of food and reflection. A potluck supper was held so that each of the four groups could compare and reflect on their trips.

The Inter-Religious Project is the name given to a work designed to bridge the gaps between different religious groups and spiritual persuasions. This past Spring Break, approximately 50 students of different religious backgrounds traveled to four separate locations in order to experience learning through community service and cultural immersion. The four trips were to Birmingham, Alabama; the Georgian Sea Islands; Lumberton, North Carolina; and Cherokee, North Carolina. Each trip had a unique experience that was discussed during the evening.

The Birmingham trip consisted of exploring spirituality and the role it plays in the culture of a community with a long civil rights history. The community service consisted of working on rebuilding the Avenue M Church of God in Christ, where the group stayed. Other trip experiences included visits to the Civil Rights Institute, as well as other civil rights based locations and volunteering in various after school programs.

Sophomore George W. Myers, a History major, says of the trip, "I expected the conditions, segregation, the realities of Confederate America to be less severe. I didn't expect the Confederation to be so alive...it's just blatant. The governor of Alabama named April Confederate Heritage Month. I wasn't aware for America to shock me so much."

The trip to the Georgian Sea Islands was an immersion in the Gullah culture. The Gullah people are descendants of West African slaves who became segregated and thus formed their own cultural tradition. That community is striving to keep out tourism and instead keep up their love of their land, culture, and way of life through use of peoples' talents and community effort.

Anthropology major Kara Camp, a Senior says of her experience in the Sea Islands, "I expected working there looking at political aspects...We drove onto this island and it was gorgeous, so preserved, as was the culture. That was what struck me the most. It's amazing the relationship they have with the environment. It's spiritual."

The Lumberton group worked with the Lumbee Nation, a non-federally recognized Native American tribe. They labored on roofs and worked to gain an understanding of what the Lumbee represent. Some historians among their tribe think that they are a combination of the lost European colony of Roanoke, runaway African slaves, and several Native American tribes. Others say that the Lumbees are a conglomeration of different Native American tribes. The group stressed that while they do not have a language or definite identity, they have a strong sense of community.

Junior Art History and Legal Studies double major Katie Ross said of the trip, "We were told to not have too many expectations. I was expecting to work, but I really didn't know what to expect culturally or spiritually. The work was what I expected, but the cultural experience was amazing. How open and warm they were, so spiritual, it was different for me. [Their] openness and friendliness shocked me."

Megan Belniak, a sophomore and former Astronomy major stated of the Cherokee trip, "It made a bookshelf for historical knowledge and gave me a contemporary context on history. It made Cherokee a reality."

The Cherokee group worked in North Carolina with the Eastern Band of the Cherokee Nation. There, they did several community service work assignments as well as met with numerous tribal members and persons connected with the tribe for political, spiritual, and social information.

Presently the members of all four trips are working on end-of-term assignments that deal with reflection as well as with developing ways in which the project can be expanded so that the University of Massachusetts campus can be made more aware of its existence.

Genetic crops potentially harmful

By Marc Kaufman
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON - Genetically engineered crops appear to be safe but the government should better coordinate how it regulates them to make sure they don't pose a danger to the environment or human health, a National Academy of Sciences report concluded Wednesday.

The Environmental Protection Agency, the Food and Drug Administration and the Department of Agriculture should work more closely to make sure engineered crops are adequately tested and monitored, a panel appointed by the academy's National Research Council concluded.

The long-awaited, 260-page report, which focused on crops engineered to protect themselves from pests, was immediately seized upon by both advocates and opponents of engineered crops to support their position that either the crops are safe and benefit the environment or that they are potentially unsafe and may pose a hazard.

Scientists have begun splicing a variety of genes into crops, including genes that enable crops to produce their own pesticides. The engineered crops have become increasingly popular among U.S. farmers because they allow them to use less chemicals.

But the crops have also become increasingly controversial, especially in Europe. Opponents fear crops that produce their own pesticides might cause insects to become more resistant, causing the need for more or stronger chemicals in the future. One recent study also suggested such crops could kill Monarch butterflies.

While the panel concluded that there currently is no evidence that the crops do pose a danger, there is enough concern and unanswered questions to warrant close scrutiny.

"Concern surrounds the possibility that genes for resisting pests might be passed from cultivated crops to their weedy relatives, potentially making the weed problem worse. This could pose a high cost for farmers and threaten the ecosystem," said Perry Adkisson, chancellor emeritus of Texas A&M University in College Station, Texas, who chaired the panel.

The 12-member panel was comprised of researchers from outside the government. But the panel itself became embroiled in controversy when the staff director took a job with the Biotechnology Industry Organization.

About three-dozen protesters gathered outside the National Academy of Sciences headquarters to condemn the report. They carried signs including one that read "The Best Science Money Can Buy." Most were wearing white lab coats.

"Regretfully, I would have to say this report is tainted by the conflicts of interest of members," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, D-Ohio, who introduced legislation that requires labeling of products containing genetically engineered crops. "A panel that leans overwhelmingly toward a pro-biotech position, including members on the payroll of the biotech industry, cannot be expected to be produce an independent report with an objective conclusion."

Elian's fate awaits result of attorney's trip to Cuba

By Karen DeYoung and Sue Anne Pressley
The Washington Post

The attorney representing 6-year-old Elian Gonzalez's Cuban father flew to Havana Tuesday night, saying he hoped to return to Washington with the father and his family before the end of this week.

Lawyer Gregory B. Craig departed after receiving what he said were assurances from the Justice Department Tuesday morning that it would take steps to transfer Elian's custody from relatives in Miami to his father once he arrives in the United States. Visas for the father, his wife and infant son, a young cousin of Elian and two others were issued Tuesday by the U.S. Interests Section in Havana.

Still pending were 22 other visas the Cuban government requested for schoolmates of Elian, a team of child psychologists and a senior Cuban official. It was not clear whether Havana would continue to insist on them as a condition for the father's departure.

The arrival of the father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, would radically change the dynamic of the now four-month-old international custody dispute. Although government officials would continue talks with the Miami relatives who have refused to relinquish the boy, in hopes of gaining their cooperation, officials said Tuesday that once the father arrives they would set in motion the process of transferring custody.

That process, which could take at least a week, would start with notification that Elian's care under "temporary parole" had been changed from that of his Miami great-uncle, Lazaro Gonzalez, to his father, Later, Lazaro Gonzalez would be given written instructions as to when and where the transfer would take place. If an agreement for a cooperative transfer had not been reached by that point, the government could go to court to compel cooperation.

Government officials said they were pleased with the prospect of Juan Miguel Gonzalez's arrival, believing it would jump-start stalled negotiations in Miami between lawyers representing the relatives and the Justice Department and the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

A fourth day of talks ended Tuesday with agreement still far from sight. They were scheduled to resume Thursday morning. Their lawyers told Justice negotiators that Lazaro Gonzalez and his daughter, Marinleysis, who was admitted to a Miami hospital Tuesday morning complaining of dizziness and nausea, were exhausted and unable to continue without a day's rest.

But they were unlikely to find much rest at their Little Havana home, where a growing number of Cuban American supporters, and an army of international reporters, surrounded the house in anticipation that the long controversy was moving toward a climax.

During the afternoon, an estimated 80 protesters broke past police barricades when rumors began flying that the boy's seizure by federal officials was imminent. Miami city police - whose mayor has said they will not participate in any federal effort to extricate him - stood calmly and watched as the demonstrators linked arms and began chanting "Freedom for Elian! Freedom for Elian!"

Tuesday's talks faltered - and at several points nearly came to a complete halt - over two conditions that attorneys for the relatives said were necessary before they would agree to any transfer of custody.

In a new demand, they said the government must obtain a commitment from Juan Miguel Gonzalez that he would not leave the country with Elian while they are appealing last month's federal court decision upholding the government's right to remove the boy from Lazaro Gonzalez's care and return him to his father. Arguments in the case are scheduled for May 11.

Rep. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., made a similar demand in a letter Tuesday to Attorney General Janet Reno, saying that if Elian were to go to Cuba before the appeals ruling is made, and it were decided in the Miami relatives favor, Cuban President Fidel "Castro will never allow the boy to come back to the United States." Menendez asked Reno to "pursue a binding agreement with Juan Gonzalez" requiring him to stay in this country.

Government officials said that attorneys for the relatives had been assured they would make their "best efforts" to ensure Gonzalez and son stayed in this country while the appeal is pending, and noted that the father had said publicly on several occasions that he would do so.

The second sticking point was the ongoing insistence by the relatives that an independent team of child psychologists be named to evaluate whether returning to Cuba with his father was in Elian's best interests.

"I'm livid, I just don't know what to say," Brookley said. "I threw that into a trashcan."

Debate about the memo continued when Michael Rossettie, the president of the Republican Club, asked Howe if Spilman had been wrong in suggesting that the presidency was in fact vacant.

Howe responded that he had been.

Rossettie asked again, this time wondering whether or not Spilman at any point lied in his questioning?

"Yes, he did lie. He presented a memo that had never been signed, and never been sent and had never seen the door of Campus Activities," Howe said.

Spilman defended himself, saying that "I took an oath to adhere to the Constitution and by laws and apparently, I'm the only senator willing to do so."

According to the SGA Constitution, "The President shall be popularly elected by a majority of plurality of the SGA membership voting...and shall serve a term of one (1) calendar year, here defined as April 1 to March 31..." The document later goes on to say that "If a vacancy shall occur in the office of President, the Speaker shall become President for the duration of the unfinished term."

"I just went in there to point out the fact that by the Constitution, Howe, for his previous term, was no longer the president, and that he had to be sworn in again," Spilman said. "In that interim time, Billard was the president. I challenged his authority, he wasn't ready to listen so instead, he threw me out."

Howe was sworn in by Chief Justice of the SGA Ricardo Rodriguez at the meeting, to the cheers of senators.

Spilman said he wanted to make his point, vote on the motions and "go home and do homework." When the document was brought to his attention, he said that it concerned him. Despite his lack of speculation, others suggested that Jennifer Teixeira, the Associate Speaker of the Senate, had given Spilman the memo, a fact she later confirmed.

However, contrary to Brookley's comment that the memo had been thrown out, she said she found on Billard's desk. As for Spilman, she said that she "kind of expected" that he would react the way he did.

"He handled it in the wrong way, but when I found the document, I was unsure of what to do. I asked his opinion, and he went nuts about it."

She said that she took an oath to uphold the Constitution and that it was her job to know how that document worked.

"We didn't have a president as of April 1, so [yesterday] we didn't have a president, so the Speaker is supposed to move up," Teixeira said. "The document showed that he'd move up, but he hadn't. This happened last year behind closed doors."

She said that her error was in asking Spilman for advice.

"I would have never brought it up to him if I'd known that he'd handle it this way," Teixeira said.

Billard said that the night reminded him "of three years ago when I joined the SGA. Reminded me of all the bad that the SGA used to represent. Tonight, everything everybody had worked for almost went out the window."

However, the SGA wasn't totally dominated by controversy surrounding Spilman and the memo.

Four motions were passed, including one supporting the UHS Dental Clinic and another supporting a change in funding for all University Funding. Two others also passed: one that would allow sophomores or freshman over 21 or with two years of prior schooling to live off campus and another that supported UMass joining Workers Right Consortium.

To Avakian, the work the SGA was able to do was "incredible"

"Senators took their jobs seriously and asked good questions tonight. The senators did a lot for students tonight, so that everything, despite the negative beginning, ended on a positive note."

Billard, for his part, announced who would play at the Spring Concert, saying that while he couldn't name the headlining act, he could say that the master of ceremonies (mc) would be Biz Markie, and that Beanie Man, the Long Beach All Stars (former members of Sublime) and Amigone Rising would perform. On a more political note, he said that nominations for open seats close April 20 at 5:00 p.m.

Lamell James announced a grassroots organizing campaign in an attempt to bring students together beginning tonight with an all-RSO meeting the Cape Cod Lounge at 8:00 p.m.

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

Our Opinion

Usurping opinions

When will people realize that not everyone shares their opinion?

Simply because you hold a certain view does not mean that everyone in the world does. Do you consider your point valid, your argument flawless, and your view to be so obviously correct that anyone not having that view is, at best, stupid or, at worse, pure evil?

Well, perhaps you're right. And perhaps you're wrong. What cannot be argued is that somewhere, somehow, someone disagrees with you, for whatever reason. Guess what! They have just as much right to their opinion as you have to yours.

A case to illustrate this point is the upcoming visit of Oliver 'Ollie' North to the UMass campus. North is a famous and controversial figure, eliciting various reactions.

The fact of North coming to this campus has spawned a controversy over the man's politics. Obviously the group that arranged for North's visit, the Republican Club, is in favor of the man whom some consider a conservative icon. On the other side are people who are offended about the presence of North on their campus, and who are papering the school with fliers featuring allegations about his past and calling for a school-wide walkout and protest over during his stay at UMass.

The thing is, though, is that this isn't their campus. We don't even know who 'they' are – there is not organization's name on these fliers calling for action.

A lesson in the way to handle an event like this is provided by the Republican Club. They are bringing in a speaker who represents views which they would like to have heard. They also put up fliers and take out advertisements, in their case citing the virtues of North and saying where he's going to be appearing. And... that's it. If you want to come the event is open to you, and if you don't, nobody is twisting anybody's arm to force you. Club President Michael Rossettie was even quoted in yesterday's Collegian as being accepting of protests as long as they did not violate the law and safety.

The other fliers on this campus take a very, very different tack in organizing their event. A feature of these fliers not found on the Republican Club ones is that they call for all students to walk out of their classes in protests of Oliver North. They want everybody to be out there expressing a certain view.

It is arrogant and naive to think that even a majority of people here at the University agree with your opinion, let alone everybody. Calling for a school-wide boycott of an event that obviously some people on campus approve of is insulting. Do you and other people of your particular opinion want to take action against the visit of Oliver North? By all means; it is your right. Do not, however, involve people who have no interest in you.

We at the Collegian believe that the Republican Club has comported itself well in the handling of this situation, and that the unnamed individuals promoting the protest have over-stepped their bounds.

Some good advice for all

Just two days ago my sister asked me to put her in my column. After reading one about my roommate Courtney, I guess she wanted to see her name in print too. So I asked her what could I possibly write about her, a senior at Chelmsford High, which would be of interest to college students. She's hasn't won her first Pulitzer Prize yet and I don't think she has any startup web companies in the makings just yet. Come to think of it, she's not that easy to describe.

She's not the annoying and bubbly type who thinks the world revolves around her; she's too smart and grounded for that. And, thankfully, the all-black, all-dreary Marilyn Manson-wear isn't her bag either – her high school doesn't accept that look.

Interrupting my thoughts, she replied, "Write one about what advice kids getting ready to go to college should hear." At first I thought that was too easy: Don't drink the punch at frat parties, wear shoes in the shower and get involved in something beyond Sega marathons. She had already learned one trick that I never did: she's very diligent about saving her money from her summer jobs so it will last beyond the middle of September.

But I think she meant it on a deeper level. Sarah is a lot like the novel, "Sarah, Plain and Tall." She's six feet of reservation and dry humor. Like me, unless she's comfortable, she doesn't have much to say. She hates to read but loves to write. She's not particularly athletic and sometimes she has to stay after school for a little extra tutoring in math.

Kathleen Ralls

In her high school, somewhat like UMass, athletes are revered and the majority of the rest of students fall into obscurity. For most of us at UMass, however, raising your hand doesn't brand you a nerd for four years and class is no longer a fashion runway. Unfortunately for her, Abercrombie doesn't carry sizes for females taller than five-foot-three. And we college students don't have dances or proms to worry about landing the perfect date, gown or tuxedo.

Beyond agonizing about which college she is attending, her main concern now is finding a date for her senior prom in June from a mother's point of view. Sarah shouldn't have a problem finding a date. After all, she's nice and funny and we look similar, shouldn't that be enough of an asset?!

Also from a mother's point of view, our older brother or my 25-year-old boyfriend should suffice for a date if all else fails?

Now, unlike me, who is trying to see how many nights she can sneak uptown before her lease runs out in May and she officially becomes unemployed, Sarah's miserable-thinking about who she should take to her prom. And it's certainly not all for nothing. The prom was a big deal for my friends and me. But high school will always be high school, and those who aren't near perfect would like to forget some of the hassle and embarrassment.

So, here's my one speck of advice to her, and it came to me via a recent conversation with Deb. It looks like neither of us are going to graduate with jobs neatly placed in our outstretched fingers. But there are no worries. After four years of work, we leave with, at the very least, padded resumes. But it's more than that.

We leave looking forward to our futures. We left high school satisfied and excited, and we put those memories behind us. Just four years removed, we watch as some of our high school heroes fade into obscurity without a sound. We talked about how sad it is when kids peak in high school, or even before that. Their biggest accomplishments happened to be the fact that they were the trendsetters that started B.U.M. Equipment and started drinking with their older sister and her friends before anybody else partied.

I'd have to tell my sister that we leave college without ever trying to be the coolest girls in school. What does that get you at a school of 24,100? Who cares anyway? We leave knowing there were always more friends to make, and better guys to meet next semester when times got lean and prospects were dim. We leave knowing that it's OK to drive around in 1985 blue and white Olds Cutlasses and 1988 grey Chevy Caprice Classics, because who really sees you? And most importantly, we leave knowing that our best years are not behind us.

As an older sister, I've always been the one to be too busy and hang up before the conversation is over. I thought being a good sister was accepting the fact that she took over my part-time jobs and other connections when I was done with them. After years of telling her that she can't tag along, maybe it's time for change.

And if I never tell her, I always imagine Sarah being one of those girls on talk shows who turn into knockouts a few years later and leave their high school crushes wishing for a second chance (I did mention that we look alike, right?)

Kathleen Ralls is a Collegian columnist.

The year may be winding down, but that doesn't mean that you can't still make your voice heard! Ed/Op will be publishing columns until the very last issue, so come talk to Alexis, Gary, or Rob!

Remember: keep your hands of others' mail

Dan Viens

I've been living with my roommate Jay for about two and a half years and I've known him for the better part of six. Up until recently we have always got along well. However all of a sudden our relationship is falling apart. I never thought this could happen to us, but all that changed when he had me arrested for opening his mail. This ordeal has been going on for most of this semester. It has been hard for me to go through my life as I normally would, but everything is different now that this court case is underway. I haven't really been able to put a lot of effort or thought into my columns because of all my legal woes. Now I am ready to use my public forum to tell my story. Hopefully by doing this I will have a weight lifted off of my shoulders.

It all started at the tail end of January. On his way from the bus to our apartment I stopped to get the mail. All that we had in the mail was a bunch of stupid credit card applications that we get because UMass sells our names and addresses. Before I threw all of the junk mail away I wanted to make sure that there wasn't anything important in any of the envelopes. I looked through mine, saw that there wasn't anything important, and tossed them all in the garbage. I was going through the same process with Jay's mail when I came across something quite odd. Inside one of the credit card application envelopes was a hand-written letter. I thought that it was a little out of place so I checked it out.

The letter was a correspondence to Jay from his pen pal in Austin, TX. I had no idea that he even had a pen pal and now I had found a letter from her stuffed in with an American Express application. It turns out that Jay has had a pen pal since the third grade. Her name is Ebalinda Whitcomb. The two of them have been corresponding since the third grade. Jay doesn't particularly like writing back and forth with the girl, but she is a paranoid schizophrenic.

During the eleventh grade he slowly stopped writing to her. After about six months without any contact with Ebalinda her mother got a hold of Jay. She told Jay that Ebalinda had gone into a deep depression due to the fact that her only friend in the world stopped returning her letters. He didn't know what to do.

He couldn't stand writing her letters never mind the fact that stamps were getting so expensive. His conscience got the best of him, though, and he resumed writing her letters. The only people he ever told about his stalker-by-mail were his parents. That all changed the day I opened the letter.

The letter I read that day talked all about the babies Ebalinda wanted to have with Jay. It said how hot she thought he was and how she can't wait to finally meet him. It turns out she doesn't even know what Jay looks like. Back in the day when she asked for him to send a picture he sent a picture of Doogie from Doogie Howser M.D. It wasn't even a real photograph: he just cut it out of his sister's copy of Tiger Beat. Ebalinda was so excited that Jay looked exactly like her favorite actor Neil Patrick Harris.

Anyway, when Jay came home and saw that I had opened the letter he became enraged. I had opened junk mail like this before so I didn't think it would be a problem, but Jay was so ashamed of his ongoing mail affair with Ebalinda that he took his father's advice and pressed charges against me. I thought it was a joke when the police came to my door. However, it turns out that Amherst has one of the strictest laws concerning the opening of other people's mail.

The cops read me my rights they and threw me in the trunk of their car. With my hands cuffed behind my back I was writhing in pain in a trunk full of envelopes. Each time I moved I got a paper cut on a different part of my body, and about twenty minutes in the trunk I passed out cold. When I woke I was in a cell filled with 10,000 letters addressed to members of the Amherst community. These letters were to inform local citizens about the seriousness of opening other people's letters. I spent an entire week in jail licking the envelopes. After this I couldn't talk for the entire month of February. Once they let me out I contacted my attorney. He said that he would love to help me out, but he didn't want to be associated with anyone who opened somebody else's mail. Plus he said he was too busy with some big murder trial.

I ended up getting a public defender appointed to me. It is quite obvious that he is not doing his best to get me acquitted of the charges I'm facing. First of all he told me that I could be looking at the death penalty. I thought that I was in the clear since there is no death penalty in Massachusetts; however, he explained that since the letter was sent from Texas their laws would be imposed on me, and everyone knows that Texas kills at least a person a week. If found guilty I will be the 22nd person killed in Texas history for some form of mail fraud. The courts see my crime as only a half step down from mail bombing.

I've tried to reason with Jay and get him to drop the charges, but he won't hear it. He never wanted anyone to know about his mentally ill pen pal that I am now telling all of campus about. I thought about moving to Canada, but I don't like hockey, penguins or Venus fly traps. I also have to admit that I have an ulterior motive for writing this column. I am trying to raise money for one of two things. Firstly I would like enough money to get myself a real lawyer. Then if I get enough money I would like to hire a hitman for Jay and Ebalinda. All donations can be sent to my home. Please make sure you address the letter to me and I promise that I will never open anyone else's mail unless I think it's porn.

I'm an Italian stallion

Gary Mendese

I have something to tell you. There is something about me that I have just recently come to terms with – something that I had overlooked my entire life until recently. It has taken a lot of people noticing this about me for it to finally sink into my head. But now I have accepted this quality of my being and I think I should share it with you. You see, what everyone has been telling me for so long... is that I look... Italian.

Wow! Really earth shattering, huh? I don't know what could have possibly given it away. Was it that back hair? Was it the tommygun I keep in my backpack? Was it the fact that my last name is Mendese? Was it the large genitalia? Who the hell knows?

In any case, I get a lot of flack about being Italian. Almost every day, I get called "WOP" or "ginzo." And almost every time I see him, your favorite Managing Editor and mine, Sam Wilkinson says, "Hey, Gary... fuhgedabahdit!" I don't know. I guess I'm just getting sensitive about it. But people saying I look Italian is not the big problem. I guess the big issue is the fact that a lot of people say I act like one of the Sopranos. They say that I have a bit of an attitude and I'm slightly bitter at times. In fact, my housemate, the "evil red-headed whore," told me that if you looked up the word "bitter" in the dictionary, you'd find my picture. Whatever, Sarah.

All right, all right. I guess I do in fact have a slight attitude at times, and I can relate to some of the characters on "The Sopranos." And I suppose I have a slight "truck driver" mouth; I swear a tad more than the average person our age. When my friends and I are sitting on the back porch smoking crack or popping Quaaludes, my wonderful companions try to see how long I can go without swearing. Sometimes I can go a few minutes... Anyway, back to being wrongfully accused. Yeah, I'm not that bitter. Honestly, I'm not. So I have worn down the enamel on my teeth from getting aggravated at people pushing the "walk" button at the crosswalk and then crossing without waiting for the light to change, thus creating a four-way red light for no reason. So what? Doesn't everyone have pet peeves?

People think that because I look really Italian and have a short temper, that I am just a nasty, unhappy person inside that would "whack" anyone that looks at me funny. And that's what's getting to me. It's upsetting me these days because it's simply not true. My friends (and people that read my columns) don't seem to understand the real me, the sensitive person that I keep deep inside, that I am a fairly laid-back guy just enjoying life.

For the most part, I try not to let things bother me. At least 6 out of 10 times that I have to stop for a pedestrian in a crosswalk, I let him cross without my blood pressure rising to critical levels. On most occasions, I don't threaten to blow up the houses of telemarketers, and I almost never ever shoot someone at point-blank range because they mispronounced my name for the 300th damn time. Also, I normally don't yell. "Hurry the hell up!" at people who hold up the line in a store because they want to find exact change in their prissy little purses or ever-so-cool fanny packs!

You see what I mean? I'm very cool, calm, and collected, and I've just been getting a bad reputation these days for no good reason. Yeah, every once in a while you'll catch me in my room sitting at my desk naked with one thumb in my mouth, ski goggles on, smashing my head against my computer monitor while singing "California Dreaming," but so what? It's called stress relief and all of my therapists tell me it's healthy.

Anyway, like I said before, I'm getting sick of all the wonderful comments I've been receiving about my "guido" attitude lately. So I've decided on a solution. I have decided to change my image a little bit. Anything to rid myself of "stereotypes."

First off, I'm going to dye my hair orange. This will make people think that I'm a freak, and everyone knows that there are no Italian freaks. Then I'm going to grow really thick chops – kind of like Sam Wilkinson's. Then people will think I'm from the South, and everyone knows that there are no sheep-impregnating Italians out there. Next, I'm going to throw all of my cologne away because that's a dead "ginzo" giveaway.

So how am I doing? Do you think that would disguise my "Italian-ness?" What, you think I should do something about my attitude, too? I'll have to not let things get to me so easily, and I'll have to stop swearing. All right, that's freaking impossible! There's no $#@$%^! way in hell I can...

I guess I blew it already, huh? Well, maybe everyone is right. I guess I'm just a bitter Italian boy after all. Oh well, who cares? I'm me and that's the way it is. So I get pissed off a lot, but that's why people like me. And if they don't, hey... fuhgedabahdit!

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! The Television King is Dead; Long Live the King

Benharris, relinquishes his remote to the new Tube Notes specialist Pizzolato.

Since the unexpected explosion of Ryan Benharris' television, things have changed — not many things — in fact almost nothing at all. Actually, there's a new writer manning the wheel at "Tube Notes", namely me, and everything is the same.

Now, although Ryan and myself both own a television, that doesn't mean we necessarily agree on what is considered decent and what is not. To illustrate this, the following column outlines what I consider to be the best and worst shows on television.

BEST SHOW (s)

"Sports Night" – ABC's dramedy (drama/comedy) that looks behind the scenes at a cable sports show. Just think "ER meets 'SportsCenter'." Why is this a great show? Its writing is quick, spontaneous and thought provoking. Its characters are not only well written but well acted with a mostly unheard of cast (with the exception of Robert Guillaume, "Benson"). Josh Charles (Dead Poet's Society) and Joshua Malina (Bulworth). Each story builds off previous ones, never leaving a storyline unfinished. In fact, the show uses real life situations create their own stories making it even more realistic. For example, Guillaume in real life had a stroke that left him very sick and unable to work. The writers worked this into the storyline by giving his character a stroke, adding realism to the writing (witnessing the recovery) but also to the acting of Guillaume and his fellow actors.

Feeding off of today's sports stories and more, "SportsNight" was voted by "TV Guide" as "The Best Show You are NOT Watching" and is arguably the best show on television.

"The Sopranos" – A drama about a Prozac popping New Jersey mob boss and his weekly problems with family and "business;" the question should be why aren't you watching this show? David Chase, the creator of "The Sopranos", has produced a show that even has real life crime families quoting lines and saying that they are the basis for the popular cable show. The writing and acting are superb and they've got the awards to back it up. If you've seen it, you know what I'm talking about; if you haven't seen Tony and the family, find a way to watch it.

"Family Guy" – From the network that brought us other animated suburban sitcoms, FOX knows a good show when they see it. Based in Quahog, Rhode Island, "Family Guy" follows the adventures of Peter Griffin and his entire family, including the intellectual canine that sips martinis instead of toilet water, and the beauty that is political incorrectness.

The animation may not be computer generated or even that well drawn but the writing is crisp and controversial, with the show focusing on making parodies of shows, like "Gumbel 2 Gumbel" a police show starring both Bryan and Greg Gumbel, than the actual plot of the Griffin family. Although sometimes stepping over the line of good taste, "Family Guy" is one to watch.

WORST SHOW

"Then Came You" – A romantic comedy about a women in her late thirties-early forties in love with a boy in his early twenties. Yeah, this is real funny. Instead of putting on this Freudian fantasy, why don't you bring back "It's Like...You Know." Or better yet take this off as well as "Two Guys and a Girl" and bring back Jeremy Piven in "Cupid."

SHOW ON THE RISE

"Wonderland" – Based in the psychiatric ward of Rivervue Hospital in New York City, Wonderland is the "NYPD Blue"-esque drama that delves into the human psyche. The fractured minds of those people who can't hold reality together for whatever reason, and it is up to the doctors to help them integrate themselves back in society. After watching this new drama, created by Peter Berg a former writer/director/star of CBS's "Chicago Hope," I was at a lost for words. The show is fast and terrific while it observes those who work to help the shunned of society. Too much happened for me to condense it, but trust me; start watching this show now, or when it really starts to become popular you'll be lost.

There you have it. Notice there was no mention of "Dawson's Creek." Trust me, it will stay that way. Next Thursday, turn back here to the arts & Living pages and start reading about why the XFL/NBC merger will fail, as well as other weekly goings-on in television.

WHAT TO WATCH THIS WEEK

"Wonderland" – Thursday at 10 p.m. on ABC.

FOX's animation block "Futurama", "King of the Hill", "The Simpsons" – Sunday starting at 7 p.m. on FOX.

"Fail Safe" – A live TV movie on CBS starting at 9 p.m.

Though it is not given the credit it deserves, "Sports Night" may be one of, if not the best show on television

Mariah forced to cancel show

As if the music world was not sad enough, it just got worse, especially for Mariah Carey fans. If you planned on going to see Mariah earlier this week, you've already found out about the bad news.

Perhaps the biggest name in popular music over the past decade is in the hospital. She apparently ate some bad oysters while touring Boston this weekend. The superstar was in town to play to a sold out crowd at the Fleet Center. She later canceled the show.

Carey's tour has been the most publicized concert over the past few months. Opening acts have included such pop stars as Da Brat, and only add to the excitement that is included in the high priced ticket. Her trip around the country began at the Staples Center in Los Angeles, and proceeded to venues that includes Las Vegas, Chicago, Miami and Atlanta. After her supposed stop in Boston on April 4 Carey was supposed to travel to Toronto on April 7, and finish the tour on April 11 in New York at Madison Square Garden. Yesterday afternoon, promoters for the pop diva announced that the Boston date would be re-scheduled to Thursday April 13th. There was no change to either the Toronto or New York shows.

The irony in this is that the film was a complete success. It was released at the beginning of the fall, when nothing else was out, and people went to see it. Why did people go to see it? Because it's the same film as The Fugitive! Though it may be unoriginal, it's still genius. It proves that you don't have to be a film specialist to produce something that the public wants to see. What I hate is that we have to see it over and over and over again.

Though blandness is certainly a popular trend, the truth is that films are always rewarded more for originality than not. A perfect example of this is last summer's blockbuster, The Blair Witch Project. The film was low-budgeted, scary, and truly something that people have not had the opportunity to experience before. The result is that it became more than a success. It turned into a phenomenon that has one guaranteed outcome. It is obvious that The Blair Witch Project will be copied an infinite number of times. How sad is it that when something becomes a success, everyone else feels the need to cash in? This summer I saw commercials spoofing confession scenes and TV shows such as "Dawson's Creek" dedicating an entire hour to the same exact story. Can't we just leave the good stuff alone?

Even technology is rarely original. The Matrix was a technological gem. There is no doubt in my mind that there have been and will be countless attempts to model technology in films after it.

Even recent films that try to argue that they are original can be strongly criticized for finding roots in used topics. The biggest box office film of all time is Titanic. Though there were thousands of interesting and new aspects of film used in the movie, where did the story come from? It was just another recap of the sinking of a ship. Anyone could have done it; it was just sitting there waiting to be made. When someone finally did conquer it, they made over $2 Billion. That's insane!

If Hollywood has taught us anything, it is that trends do not last long. Last year there were three films nominated for Best Picture about World War II. Saving Private Ryan, The Thin Red Line, and Life Is Beautiful seem to be the end of the quick trend that came to a dismal halt when the wretched Jakob the Liar, starring Robin Williams, hit theaters a few months after the success was at its peak.

So if trends come and go, what does the future hold for films? Well, if producers do not attempt to come up with their own ideas, there will, without a doubt, be more thrillers like The Sixth Sense. The fact that the film was a surprise box office hit, and was nominated for a bunch of Oscars, makes it one of the biggest winners of all time. It is certain that there will be more thrillers released this year. Think about it, how many times have you heard, "I see dead people?" It's insane.

With pop culture making a constant downward spiral to please the masses, films such as Double Jeopardy are just another reminder that there is hardly anything new to see. That reminds me, if you'd like to get punched in the face, say "Whazzup" one more time!

also worth a listen.

Creed: If Pearl Jam and Metallica filed a joint plagiarism lawsuit against this band, there isn't a court in the country that wouldn't convict them. If Creed were sincerely trying to breath a little more creative life into grunge, one might possibly be able to defend them, but their shameless combination of Eddie Vedder's voice and generic grunge-metal guitars, arranged around too-typical songwriting and unforgivably lame lyrics, seals their fate as stylistic crooks. Creed is like a cuisinart for their many influences: a little Stone Temple Pilots, a little Live, a little Pearl Jam, a little Smashing Pumpkins, a little Nirvana, a little Metallica, all whipped up into a bland, muddled mess of trends radio rock.

The Goo Goo Dolls, Train, Vertical Horizon, Tonic, etc.: You know you're in bad shape when you have to imitate the Gin Blossoms.

Limp Biscuit, Kid Rock, Korn, etc.: I don't care how many bands find a way to market the same tired metal-rap power chord song to the same crowd of musically unenlightened teenagers; I'll never hear these bands as anything but second-rate Rage Against the Machine wannabes. Rage taught us, and continues to teach us, three important lessons. First, the electric guitar is an incredibly versatile instrument capable of much more than your average, flash-in-the-pan metal band uses it for. Second, the exclusive use of rap as a vocal strategy doesn't require a thinning or over-repetition of the accompanying music. Third, music is not only compatible with politics, but can benefit greatly by the intellectual immediacy of social and political matters.

Buckcherry: Lead singer Joshua Todd wants to be Chris Robinson from the Black Crowes so bad he can taste it. Every morning he wakes up, looks at himself in the mirror, and decides that he needs to get a few more tattoos, a few more leather bras and lose another 15 pounds. He's had the vocal imitation down for years. Seriously, folks, these guys are basically a Black Crowes cover band that decided to record an album of watered down pop-rock.

On a personal note, I'd like to mention Radiohead and Beck as two popular contemporary artists who, despite the musical wasteland of their peers, are working to evolve popular music in new and exciting ways. Each is more than worth your time.

■ girls

Spears, now 18 years old, is from Louisana. She got her start on the Mickey Mouse Club. She has blonde hair. Christina Aguilera is also 18. She worked on the Mickey Mouse Club with Britney. She has blonde hair. Jessica Simpson is a whopping 19 years old and hails from Texas. Jessica's career really began when she landed a spot on the Mickey Mouse Club. Oh, she also has blonde hair. Mandy Moore, just 15 and has blonde hair. Although she wasn't on the Mickey Mouse Club, she is from Orlando.

The commonalities between the female pop artists are: most requested on MTV's Total Request Live (TRL), selling the most singles, winning Grammy's and climbing the proverbial charts, are almost unbelievable. If more blonde haired Southern girls formerly seen on the Mickey Mouse Club appear, suspicion of a communist takeover carried out through annoying appeal is not unreasonable.

So, how did it happen? Clever marketing schemes, sure. But if we give credit for originality to the people who bring us these latently political, pre-pubescent girls to us, well, then we have no resolution for this vapid column. Instead, we can look back to the previous trends in pop music for harbingers.

Spears, in an interview with Big Bopper, said that she and her friends used to dress up and pretend they were Madonna in her living room. Although Madonna's fame is entirely based in deeply mediated advertising, her success – save the savage use of sexuality – is of a different breed. Perhaps the embraced youth of yesteryear in singers like Debbie Gibson and Tiffany, the deliberate opposition of the two, is more responsible for our contemporary dilemma.

At any rate, there is little sign that things will improve as original female pop vocalists have been rapidly, consistently on the decline. As seen vaguely in 80's pop and more vividly in the early 90's, pop fame is borne of mimicry and one's willingness to sell their soul.

Gorky's Spanish Dance Troupe and a Full Devil Jacket today in Trax

GORKY'S ZYGOTE MYNCI
Spanish Dance Troupe
Mantra Recordings

Listening to this CD is like watching a kid with ADD: as soon as you think it might have settled on something, it moves on to something completely different. The 15 tracks on this album explore the full spectrum of folk and traditional music, from subdued, whispered songs featuring little more than soft fingerpicking on a dulled acoustic guitar with slide guitar enhancement (as in "Hallway"), to raucous piano-driven dance tunes featuring singers imitating howling dogs (as in "Poodle Rockin'"). And those are just the first two tracks.

Over time, the album does get into a more homogenous blend of acoustic folk music, making use of most every instrument imaginable. Several tracks are short, charming instrumentals, and all display an attention to detail and clever, imaginative arrangement. There are some off-putting production choices to be found, as in the obnoxious change of the otherwise beautiful "The Fool," but the album displays enough intelligence to allow the listener to overlook the band's occasional odd indulgence. B- (David Troupes)

FULL DEVIL JACKET
Full Devil Jacket
Island Def Jam

Enter Full Devil Jacket, the latest group attempting to milk the recent aggro alt-metal craze for all it's worth. Among their contemporaries are Staind, Dope and the Deadlights, none of which have a good album among them but still are invited to tour with some of metal's finest due to their unexplainable popularity. Korn had the aggro thing down about six years ago and no one has improved upon it since. And we are at the point right now where bands could care less about improving the formula, since they are more than content with simply milking its temporary worth and leaving us with countless crappy albums.

The Jackson, TN five-piece consists of bassist Kevin Bebout, drummer Keith Foster, guitarists Mike Reaves and Jason Montoya, and vocalist Josh Brown. According the press, Brown "is capable of summoning both heaven and hell," although there's nothing heavenly about this album. His voice is bland and completely without any distinguishable features, and the same goes for the music which is simply droning and monotonous for the most part. The heaviest stuff from Bush and Creed should give you a basic idea of their sound. This isn't Crowbar-style droning, but after a few songs you will with it were, since at least that band drones with some purpose. The only two bright spots, and they ain't that bright, are the fairly rocking opener "Wanna Be Martyr" and the off-the-wall lyrics and energy of the superbly titled "Mr. Wiggly." Otherwise, the name of the game here is just one angst-filled song after another. Mad at girlfriend? Check. Yearning for lost childhood? Check. This type of metal really is at the paint-by-numbers stage at this point, and there is a desperate need of someone to come and give the subgenre a good kick in the pants, because Full Devil Jacket certainly doesn't. Grade: D (Michael Delano)

PATTI SMITH
Gung Ho
Arista

When considering the incredible amount of pure drivel that has corrupted and ultimately corroded the music scene of today, it is comforting to realize that there are still voices from the past determined to purge this wasteland and begin reconstruction. On Gung Ho, the latest effort from one of the few survivors of the 70's New York punk scene, Patti Smith snarls in her best Dylan impersonation "Our sacred stage has been defaced/Replaced to grace the marketplace." Gung Ho is being released at a time when fans of meaningful music have been put to sleep by the likes of Limp Bizkit and N'Sync, and Patti Smith is hell-bent on waking them up.

This album is arguably Smith's strongest since Horses, and much of the credit must go to producer Gil Norton for maintaining a crisp and smooth sound while somehow keeping the dark and murky atmosphere of Smith's songwriting intact. "One Voice" jumpstarts the album, driven by the tribal thunder of drummer Jay Daugherty and snaky guitar interplay between Lenny Kaye and Oliver Ray. The album then runs through a virtual collage of musical styles, from the ethereal R.E.M. like folk of "Grateful" to the spiraling funk of "New Party." Smith is once again surrounded by very capable musicians, as Kaye proves with his energetic, Mark Knopfler-esque solo in "Persuasion," while the electricity generated between Daugherty and bassist Tony Shanahan in the psychedelic "Gone Pie" transports the listener into Smith's world and rarely allows them the chance to escape.

Musicianship aside, it is the poetic musings and pain filled wails of Patti Smith that steal the show. The surrealistic Zen of "Boy Who Cried Wolf" features a calm, elegiac vocal performance, while the raucous "Glitter in their Eyes" garners its strength from the pure, undistilled venom of Smith's spite for those who treat children as commodity, whether it be wartime officials or agents of the music business. The brooding title track is the album's masterpiece, as Smith uses haunting, violent imagery to construct an epic sound poem about Ho Chi Minh. Of course, as with most ambitious albums, there are spots of pretension on Gung Ho, such as the banal lull of "Strange Messengers." Nevertheless, Gung Ho stands tall as a call to arms by a true rock pioneer, and hopefully the music scene will heed Smith's warning in "New Party:" "We got to surely clean it up/Clean our house." Grade: B+ (Michael Suppappola)

SIX BY SEVEN
The Closer You Get Mantra Records

Six By Seven's The Closer You Get contains 12 tracks of mixed genres and edgy trip/punk/rock, delivered with enough energy and textural peculiarities to separate the band from its long list of influences – and you can hear, among others, Radiohead, the Smashing Pumpkins, and Portishead. "Eat Junk Become Junk," the first track, opens with a simple but powerful guitar riff, and the song expands at a manic pace into a full-bore angsty punk rock anthem. The second track, "Sawn Off Metallica T-Shirt," fails to gel into a worthwhile tune, and comes across as so much messy noise; beyond that one glitch, however, the album holds up surprisingly well. The more bombastic tunes are balanced by trippy, slow-escalation songs and minimalist production values. The Closer You Get may take a few listens before you can appreciate it, but there's a surprising wealth of creative and intelligent music to be found. B+ (David Troupes)

ROBERT BRADLEY'S BLACKWATER SURPRISE
Time To Discover
BMG

For most people, what they remember about Robert Bradley's Blackwater Surprise is the small hit "Once Upon a Time" from their 1996 debut Blackwater Surprise. I remember seeing a live performance of this incredible song on a very different MTV around the time of its release, and the lyrics ("I remember Marvin Gaye... Otis Redding") being soulfully brought to life by the compelling lead singer, blind Alabama vocalist Bradley. Now the Detroit-based band is back with a new member, Tim Diaz on keyboards, and a second album, Time to Discover, after years of touring, television performances, and soundtrack contributions.

First things first about the new album: RBBS does not need any help in the vocal department, and especially not from the likeable but untalented Kid Rock. Detroit love withstanding. The Bullgod can pimp it all he needs to, but there really was no need for him display his flow on not one but two tracks. "Ride" and "Tramp 2," lessening the vocal time of one of the most distinctive and heart-wrenching vocalists in modern music. Thankfully, Bradley's scratchy, emotive vocals are the main attraction on all of the other tracks, easily drawing attention away from the solid musicianship present. That's not to say the music isn't notable, however, and the sounds that emanate from the aforementioned Diaz, bassist Andrew Nebra, guitarist Michael Nebra, and drummer Fuwlkes certainly have their appeal. They help to create the atmosphere of a smoke-filled bar with a band playing, a kind of music that can't be defined as background or foreground, just one that fills the room but recedes to let other elements work. There are standout moments, like the inventive scratches and cool bass line of "Take Love and Receive It," and the jubilant drive of "Ride." Also notable are the story-like lyrics and uncharacteristically high-pitched vocals on the fun "Mr. Tony." For an old-school R&B groove with some modern elements mixed in here and there, RBBS should fit the bill. It's a shame there isn't a single as grabbing as "Once Upon a Time," but hopefully this release, like its predecessor, will get the respect it deserves. B+ (Michael Delano)

GOATS IN TREES
When the Morning Comes
Rudy Records

This eight-track offering showcases Goats in Trees's love of the soothing, melodic side of folk music, combining acoustic guitars and clean electric guitars with subtle bass and unobtrusive brush-heavy percussion. Lead vocal (and songwriting) duties are shared by Monica Cohen and Jason Grigler and although neither singer shines, there's little to complain about. The songs themselves are soft and slow, almost to a fault because there's nothing to contrast them against; the eight tracks of When the Morning Comes have a definite time maintaining listener interest. The title track sounds like any number of latino Taylor tunes, a solo association to be sure. Lyrically, too, the songs generally fail to grab your attention.

Ultimately, this album sounds like a collection of demos; it's a good first start toward producing a complete album, but more is needed – more songs, more variety among songs, and more lyrical thoughtfulness. C+ (David Troupes)

BENDER
Jehovah's Hitlist
TVT

Milwaukee's Bender has the requisite elements for a modern-day rock band: various states of facial hair and flowing locks, an empty gaze, and a blandly generic sound. They are comparable to Creed in their blandness, and therefore have the potential to become very popular if not respected by music fans. The press release brags how Bender doesn't claim to be anything, lets the music speak for itself and maintains their low-key non-rock star image. Whatever happened to a little originality? When Oasis yells about how they are the greatest band on the planet, whether you agree or not, they sure as hell get your attention. Korn and Limp Bizkit, even if they weren't mega-stars now, would still garner some attention with the former's cathartic vocals and the latter's high pitched delivery giving them an air of originality and something to separate them from the hordes. Bender has no such characteristics. That would be acceptable if their music spoke volumes – but the sounds on Jehovah's Hitlist are more like a faint whisper.

"Superfly" is a really uninspiring opener that displays only the most basic of sludge riffs and easily fades out of memory very quickly. Thankfully, things take a big turn for the better with "Isolate" although this track proves to be the pinnacle of the album. They perfectly showcase Kent Bovee's powerful vocals, which sound both fragile and powerful at once in this heartfelt song. I might really like to hear this song on the radio, and I think it could do well on that medium. But this level of quality just isn't sustained throughout the album. Things really are at their best when Bovee gets to show off his voice; like on "Fall on Your Head" and lead vocal (and songwriting) duties are shared by Monica Cohen and Jason Grigler and although neither singer shines, there's little to complain about. The songs themselves are soft and slow, almost to a fault because there's nothing to contrast them against; the eight tracks of When the Morning Comes have a definite time maintaining listener interest. The title track sounds like any number of latino Taylor tunes, a solo association to be sure. Lyrically, too, the songs generally fail to grab your attention.

Ultimately, this album sounds like a collection of demos; it's a good first start toward producing a complete album, but more is needed – more songs, more variety among songs, and more lyrical thoughtfulness. C+ (David Troupes)

Spider & The buddah

On Saturday April 8, 2000, at 8 p.m. in the Bowker Auditorium, the Asian Dance and Music program will present, "The Spider and the Buddha: Sha Shu Higby."

The talents of Sha Sha Higby are simply unlimited. The Asian Dance and Music Program is very proud to bring her to the University of Massachusetts. She was born in the Bay area of California and attended the California College of Arts and Crafts in Oakland. After winning a fullbright Scholarship to study Noh mask making, calligraphy and tea ceremony for a year in Kyoto, Japan, she learned dancing and puppetry in India. The performance boasts that it will combine dance and theater with meditation.

The most elaborate portion of the show will certainly be the incredible costumes. The costumes are hand made by Higby out of wood, paper, silk, ceramics and gold leaf, and include brown body paint. The costumes can take her up to two years to create, and weigh around thirty-three pounds each. It takes about six hours to put the costumes on.

Tickets for "The Spider and the Buddha: Sha Shu Higby," can be purchased by calling (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS. They are priced at $15.00 and $10.00 for general admission, and $7.00 for five college students.

Johnny Rotten always a pistol of sex

By J.D. Considine
The Baltimore Sun

No sooner does the operator announce "Here's Johnny Rotten" than a great, phlegmy noise starts up on the other end of the line. To describe the sound as "throat clearing" would be an understatement.

It's not the most pleasant sound, yet somehow it seems oddly appropriate. This being the same Johnny Rotten who once fronted the notorious English punk band the Sex Pistols, it's hard to hear such hacking and harrumphing without flashing back to the old punk-rock practice of "gobbing," in which members of the audience showed their appreciation by expectorating onto the performers.

Luckily, our nun Rotten has no such compliment in mind.

"I'm sorry, I've got a bad head cold," he says, with a self-deprecating chuckle. "Hello, anyway."

In an instant, the stereotype shatters. Instead of the sarcasm, disdain and confrontational profanity that the punk rock mythology would lead one to expect from Johnny Rotten, what the voice on the other end of the line offers is charm and wit, insight and laughter. It isn't just that this Rotten is smart, funny, and surprisingly well-read; he's also remarkably clear-sighted, innately suspicious of hype and pomposity. And he refuses to take anything too seriously, including himself.

"I'm always self-depreciating," he says. "I'm not an arrogant swine, I don't think. I like to pretend to be arrogant, because it's a humorous thing, but nobody could actually live their life that way."

He laughs wickedly, then asks, with mock innocence, "Could they?"

Of course they could, and Rotten makes fun of such folk – including himself – at every opportunity. He sees this puncturing of windbags as not just an avocation but a sort of public service.

Unfortunately, not everyone agrees.

"I tend to annoy a lot of people," he admits. "But to my mind, the people I'm annoying are not intelligent people, or creative people. It tends to be the people who just want to follow the rules. They find me very, very irritating."

Rotten believes his hectoring forces people to abandon stereotypes and examine their suppositions – in other words, to think. "And a lot of people don't like to think," he says.

Rotten is on the phone from Los Angeles, ostensibly to talk about the second installment of his VH1 series "Rotten TV," a half-hour skewering of celebrity, hypocrisy and the movie business.

But he's not a one-project guy, and as the interview rambles on, he brings up his Internet talk show, "Rotten Radio" (which is heard Saturdays on eYada.com), and the new Sex Pistols documentary, "The Filth and the Fury." And somewhere in the midst of all that, he manages to go into the recording studio from time to time and make music.

"I don't want to be routine," he says. "And the pressure of a routine... " He sighs. "With all the other things going on in my life, I just can't afford to dedicate totally to one specific thing and one schedule. My life is very, very, very busy at the moment."

How did the one-time terror of the London punk scene end up a multimedia workaholic? Some of the difference between then and now stems from the fact that almost a quarter-century has passed since Rotten (now 44) first snarled "Anarchy in the U.K." scandalizing Britain and kick-starting the punk rebellion of the 1970s. After the Sex Pistols broke up, after an abortive U.S. tour in 1978, Rotten reverted to his original name, John Lydon, and led several incarnations of his own band, Public Image, Ltd.

In 1986, after winning a lawsuit against Malcolm McLaren, the Sex Pistols' manager, he resumed calling himself Rotten, and in 1996, was part of a Sex Pistols reunion tour (with original bassist Glenn Matlock taking the place of the late Sid Vicious). Along the way, he has acted in a few films, made appearances as a chat-show guest, and eventually worked up to being a TV and (Internet) radio host himself.

"Rotten TV" springs from the same impulses that inspired the Sex Pistols' "God Save the Queen." As he put it at the end of the first episode, "I slag myself off just as much as anyone else, because I deserve it when I'm wrong." Then, turning to the camera and looking the viewer in the eye, he adds, "And so do you."

To slag someone off – to mock and belittle them – is a Rotten specialty. But it isn't something he does simply to show his own superiority, much less to generate a cheap laugh. Look beneath the invective, and what you'll find is a set of deeply held and carefully considered values – a moral code that touches on everything from international politics to show-biz practices.

It isn't a matter of abstract intellectualism, either, as Rotten quite frequently wears his heart on his sleeve. Take, for instance, his involvement with Julien Temple's Sex Pistols documentary, "The Filth and the Fury."

"I'm very angry with the way the company (distributing the film) in America are trying to go around promoting it," he says. "But not so angry. It's just that they've tried to rope me out of (the process). But because the film is so precious to me – it's the story of my life – I tend to be very demanding. I want to know every single aspect.

"Is that so wroooonnnng?" he asks, in a bad Harvey Fierstein impression.

Yet for all his iconoclasm, Rotten can be surprisingly traditional in his passions. He is, for instance, a believer in the maxim "The show must go on."

"I'd never leave stage, even if both ankles were broken. Unlike very many rock bands here," he says. "How many bands have had boo-boos on their ankles and not toured? Manson. Limp Bizkit. ..."

So he's not a Limp Bizkit fan, then? "Well, Limp Wrist is what they should have called themselves, after canceling a gig after (singer Fred Durst) got a boo-boo on his ankle," he says, derisively. "I mean, he only shouts. It's not like he's doing any great ballet out there.

"I've been onstage before with shattered ankles, or whatever. You have to do it. You can't let people down when they've paid money."

Offering a solid performance regardless of circumstances is, says Rotten, a sacred trust. "Unfortunately not many entertainers feel that way. ... Well, there are some who won't go away, like Bruce Springsteen."

He cackles. "Four-and-a-half hours?" he asks, mockincredulously. "Will you stop? You're punishing us! What have I ever done to you?

"I've never seen it as impressive to stay on the stage that long," he adds. "But good for him, anyway. I'm just taking the mick, really. I mean, he works bloody hard, and so I applaud that."

Rotten applauds Springsteen? Another stereotype bites the dust.

Pilot honors lost colleague

By Michael E. Ruane
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – They were old flying buddies, Gus and Doug. One, a veteran who'd been in the air since he was a Mississippi teenager; the other a more recent pilot, who often flew traffic reporters around for a living.

They flew together on weekends, shared aerial mishaps and jawed around the hangar about the romance of aviation. Gus wanted to be the first to fly to the North Pole in an open-cockpit aircraft. Doug pledged to go along in a chase plane for support.

But on Wednesday, as Gustavus A. McLeod, 45, of suburban Gaithersburg, MD, loaded his blue and yellow Boeing Stearman for the historic flight to the pole, his cargo included, sadly, a container of his friend's ashes.

Seventeen months ago, as the expedition was being planned, Doug Loring Duff, 42, of Alexandria, VA, was killed when the traffic plane he was piloting crashed in fog near suburban Bowie, MD.

McLeod mourned his friend, but vowed to make the trip anyhow, and this week promised that if he reached the pole, his buddy would, too.

McLeod, son of a Methodist preacher from Corinth, MS, is undertaking what may be one of the last feats in aviation adventure, an exploit reminiscent in its daring of the golden, and often deadly, days of flying.

He departed Wednesday morning, planning to fly in 10 stages from Montgomery Air Park, in Gaithersburg, about 3,500 miles to the North Pole, exposed to the elements in the biplane's cockpit.

His refurbished Stearman, a former crop duster built in 1939 as an Army trainer, flies at about 90 mph. McLeod will be swathed in special mittens, mask, boots, pants and parka against temperatures of 45 below.

The trip, chronicled by National Geographic and detailed at northpole2000.com, should take about 10 days. It will carry him – at times just 100 feet above the ground – over remote spots like Resolute and Weather Station Eureka in Canada, places "overwhelming" in their vast beauty, he said.

Accompanied by a new chase pilot, Steve Pearce of Durham, NC, McLeod will stay strapped into the plane's hard wooden seat for hours, eating and drinking only at night after they stop flying for the day.

McLeod, a chemical engineer who also served as a CIA agent and a designer of submarine components, hopes to land at the geographic North Pole.

He made a test flight last year to the magnetic north pole, 1,200 miles closer, and almost crashed into Hudson's Bay.

The geographic North Pole, at the Arctic Ocean meeting place of the planet's lines of longitude, was first reached in 1909, via dog sled, by American explorer Robert E. Peary. Explorers Richard E. Byrd and Floyd Bennett are credited with first getting there by air – in an enclosed three-engine Fokker – in 1926.

"I've always been a fan of the guys in the great days of aviation, Admiral Byrd and Lindbergh and all those guys, who could go out on their own wit and take on the elements, take on the challenges," McLeod, a bearish man who hums oldies as he flies, said earlier this week.

"Through some quirk in the records, this one hasn't been done," he said, a claim corroborated by Smithsonian Institution aviation expert Tom Crouch. " And we're doing it in an airplane that the first aviation explorers would have used."

McLeod's Stearman, made of wire, fabric, aluminum and spruce, is one of aviation's classic machines. Designed in the 1920s, it is powered by a seven-cylinder, 220-horsepower radial engine turning a two-blade propeller. Technically, the plane is a two-seater, but the front seat has been taken out to make room for two more gas tanks, adding a capacity of 110 gallons to its usual 46, stored in a tank in the upper wing, just over the fuselage.

"This is the airplane that made Boeing rich," McLeod said as he showed it off Monday. "They won the contract to build these for Army trainers. ... This one served throughout World War II, at Randolph field, Texas."

After the war, the plane dusted crops, wound up in a barn and then underwent restoration before McLeod bought it in 1995 for about $75,000.

Despite its age and frail look, McLeod said, it's a rugged machine.

"There's nothing you can do to this airplane in the air to make it come apart," he said. "Absolutely nothing. That thing is tough. It defines the word."

UMass decked by Hall

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

It has been ripped apart, to the point where fielding a team is almost the toughest battle. As the Massachusetts women's tennis team rolls on in the spring season, its character has been put in question. And despite its lackluster campaign, the Minutewomen have forged on.

Yesterday in South Orange, NJ, the Pirates of Seton Hall extinguished the Maroon and White handily, knocking them off, 5-1, leading the doubles matches to be cancelled as the Hall had already captured the victory.

The loss drops the Minutewomen's record to 4-15 on the 1999-2000 season, much of their misfortune on the court coming from what goes on outside the court.

Sophomore Annie Hamilton picked up the lone win for the Minutewomen disposing of Kyli Caballo in straight sets, 6-2, 7-6. This comes a few days after the Texan's triumph at the three spot helped UMass to a formidable afternoon against Temple, one it would eventually drop.

No. 1 Ola Gerasimova struggled early, dropping the first set, 6-1, to Pille Arike. Just a game into the second round, the senior retired, handing the victory to Arike. Such luck followed for the rest of the afternoon, as UMass battled, but came up empty outside of Hamilton's performance.

After taking both of her matches against the Owls, Robyn Lebovitz couldn't equal her singles performance, falling at the No. 5 spot, 6-1, 6-2. The team's captain swept through Temple over the weekend, but had her difficulties from the beginning.

Helena Horak fell as the two seed, but not after a challenge. She dropped in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3, while Katie Stammen and Michelle Kuhr followed suit at the fourth and sixth spots, respectively.

The Minutewomen will play their final home match of the season tomorrow against Fairfield at 3 p.m. at the Upper Boyden Tennis Courts. The Stags are 7-6 on the season, their most recent victory coming in a 9-0 blanking of Marist. However, they've dropped their last two matches heading into Amherst. Fairfield is led by No. 1 Lenka Hurton, who has played about .500 all season long.

Hoyas atop, rest of ECAC barely afloat

Put or shut up. Put up goals or shut the door behind you on your way out.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's struggles were quite as evident in State College, the offense arduously found the back of the net eight times, but each one came with oh-so-much effort. It was like plucking eyebrows.

Even still, the Minutemen have reached a crossroads in their season. They gaze into the crystal ball and their future is starting to clear up, but the true image won't be able to be made out for a couple weeks. UMass understands the task ahead, but the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) crown is all but out of the Maroon and White's grasp.

It's almost assumed at this point. Georgetown's way out in front and not even a hare-like impersonation could keep the Hoyas from coming down on the rest of the ECAC. Others are hoping to ruin Georgetown's fairy tale hopes, hopes that many believe can propel the squad to a national championship.

Last weekend's 14-10 triumph over Navy only added to the burning fire that is the Dave Urick-led Hoyas are stampeding towards a second consecutive title run. The Midshipmen stood tall with a gritty performance, but falling down by five in the game's opening five minutes did the Academy in, outscoring G'town for the duration of the contest.

From the beginning, it seemed as though Georgetown was on its way to claiming the first ever ECAC crown, a year removed from its 13-9 semifinal loss to Syracuse, the eventual NCAA runner-up. With added desire to improve on a breakthrough season in the nation's Capitol, the Hoyas raced to a 6-0 record before a late score by Duke handed GU its first loss.

Which leads to the Minutemen (4-3, 1-2 ECAC), which searches and searches for some sort of identity, this after an 11-8 disaster at Penn State, closing out a three-game road slate. The Minutemen now return to Amherst to find a place for itself, as their most recent loss has stationed them right in the middle of a mess that has become the conference's second tier.

After disposing of Stony Brook with ease, UMass head coach Greg Cannella watched the offensive struggles of years past resurface against the Midshipmen, the team scoring a measly three goals after dropping a 17-spot on the Seawolves. For the moment, it seemed it was merely a brief funk of sorts, but the Minutemen looked sloppy against the Nittany Lions, failing to weather a mid-game storm that left them under a significant amount of rubble.

The loss came at just about the worst time for Cannella, whose squad was riding high following a pair of road wins and a pasting of Vermont at Garber Field. The Minutemen's three-game win streak catapulted them to 16th in the nation and had the Amherst faithful remembering the days of Brendan Glass and Chris Grande. However, Penn State hushed the Maroon and White by simply outhustling them to every groundball. As a result, UMass has nearly dropped out of the polls, landing at the 20th spot heading into Saturday's clash with No. 16 Maryland-Baltimore County (3-4, 2-2 ECAC), another playoff squad from last year. Penn State moved to 4-4 with the win, leapfrogging the Minutemen in the polls in the process.

It doesn't help that UMass heads into the meat of its season, facing four top 15 squads in its next five games, the exception being the UMBC Retrievers. That in mind, the future doesn't bode well for the Minutemen, who are 0 for 2 against the nation's Top 20.

The ultimate goal heading into the conference's inaugural season was to capture the first-ever automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament. It seems unlikely that the Maroon and White would land the free trip after two conference losses, as Georgetown faces conference speed bumps Stony Brook and Rutgers before its Easter weekend tussle with the Minutemen in D.C. So the route now whips around the mountains, facing the toughest hills.

Last season, the Maroon and White faced a similar situation, where an either/or game was won by the opposition, in this case, Butler, who stormed in and out of Amherst with a 9-7 victory. It sent UMass on a tailspin, losing four of its final five games, all against top competition. And much like last year's 4-8 campaign, the Minutemen stayed in nearly every game, in its losses failing to come up with the key goal to put them over the top. They lost five games by two goals or less, responding this season with a sequel performance, which, to Cannella's dismay, follows the original screenplay to a tee. All three of UMass' losses have come by three goals, as the offense has sputtered in all three, failing to reach double figures.

So the showdown at Garber will put the Minutemen to the test, and give the college lacrosse nation a good idea of who will be where come next month's NCAA Tournament. Saturday's matchup with UMBC will put one team in the hunt, the other in the cold. With the aforementioned speed bumps occupying the conference basement, this weekend's loser moves closer to joining them.

After a dismal season a year ago, one couldn't ask for a conference crown, but the fandom built in Amherst asks and asks and asks. Only time will tell if the Minutemen have an answer to its call.

Samii, Navarro guide UMass to win

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Staff

It's not whether you win or lose, but how you play the game that counts. Yesterday the Massachusetts men's tennis team not only played their matches against Hartford with integrity and skill but won almost all of them convincingly as well.

Head coach Judy Dixon and company felt the leadership of its seniors as the squad pushed its record to 8-9 overall with a 5-2 trouncing of Hartford. Parsa Samii rendered Casey Johnston a pulverizing blow, defeating him soundly in straight sets, 6-3, 5-4, where Johnston lost by default in the second frame. Fellow senior Bo Navarro also walked away a champion in his match against Hartford sophomore Chris Hartmann, a foreign player from Sweden, when the match ended by default after Navarro took the match's first two games.

Hartford	2

Sophomore Todd Champeau used two tiebreak wins to stop the Hawks' Dan Mork dead in his tracks, defeating the senior handily, 7-6, 4-6, 7-6. And junior Bill Greener topped off their momentous day by raking in his own victorys against sophomore Anthony Russo winning in two straight sets 6-2, 6-0.

After a valiant effort Steve Prisco dropped his match against freshman Predrag Zdravkovic 6-2, 6-2, as did junior Fabian Rabanal against foreign player Nemania Bala from Yugslavia, 6-3, 6-3.

Yesterday's victorys was crucial for the Minutemen not only in terms of its numerical value in their rankings, but also in terms of the priceless emotional reward it offered the Minutemen who have been fighting for more wins this season. Judy Dixon couldn't have been happier for her troops who have diligently been striving to achieve a physical and mental balance, seeking help not only during their early morning practices, which assist them with their technical skills, but through means of a sports psychologist as well. She knew that for her players, yesterday's victory translated into them finally reaping the fruits of their labor.

"We needed to remember what it's like to win," Dixon said, "and that's mostly what today was about because in tennis like in any other sport if you lose enough times what it does is your confidence gets so affected that you forget what its like to be on the ropes or you forget what its like to close out a match."

Not only did the Minutemen remember what it feels like to win, but they braved the frigid temperatures yesterday. While the student body bundled up indoors trying to keep warm, the racketeers were on the Upper Boyden tennis courts slugging it out against the Hawks. Yet they toughed it out, despite the adverse conditions and walked away with something to show for their effort.

"I was glad Bill Greener got in the lineup," Dixon said. "He's such a hard worker, he comes in day in, day out to play and he won his match easily and that's really good. Champeau continues to have the best record on the team and he fights really hard and and he's improving with each match. Today I was very pleased with Parsa [Samii], and he's one of those senior leaders that we need to step up, and his energy was very good today."

Dixon has good reason to be pleased with Samii's effort. Samii arrived at the match after an unusual pre-match encounter, which left him shaken. He managed to compose himself and focus on his game, however, arising victorious.

Missing from Dixon's lineup was Will Shaw, whose performance Dixon feels has recently diminished. However Dixon feels that Shaw, who is only a freshman and already a valuable asset to the team, and who has a fine record, will intensify the explosive level of tennis that he's capable of playing in their upcoming match against Fordham on April 7th here at home on the Boyden tennis courts.

Torre a pure luxury for George, Yanks

By Michael Knisley
The Sporting News

To Yankees fans Joe Torre tells this cautionary tale over and over. It's a story about the days when he managed the Cardinals and took a pitching staff without a prayer into Denver's mile-high air for a four-game series. It's a story about his pitchers back then; pitchers who were not proficient at the strikeout or the groundball out. It's a story about a staff, one featuring Bob Tewksbury, a fine pitcher by most standards except the standards that apply in Denver, that depended on fly balls for its outs.

"And in Colorado," Torre says, "that's not healthy. I've always tried to be the most positive person possible as far as thinking about how we can get things done. But we went into that series not thinking we could win a single game. It's a helpless feeling. It really is."

Just as Torre feared, the Cardinals were swept.

As he told that story again near the end of spring training in a back-diamond dugout behind Legends Field in Tampa, he looked younger, healthier and better-rested than he has in years. Torre spent six weeks in Hawaii before camp opened, and it clearly agreed with him. Hawaii, it appears, is where he'll retire. He and his wife spent part of those six weeks looking for retirement property, in fact.

That bit of background gives a little more resonance to the tale he told again about pitching. This time, he told it in the context of the god-awful spring record the Yankees put together in the first three weeks of the Grapefruit League season. A week and a half before opening day, the two-time defending World Series champions had the worst exhibition record in baseball.

His point was this: Not to worry. Yankees fans, even if the spring looks like a disaster. The Yankees can pitch. The Yankees can get their outs any way they need to: strikeouts, groundouts or fly outs.

"With these guys," Torre says, "I'm thinking of how we can win every game. Because every time we send a pitcher out there, I think we have a chance to win. That's the mentality of it here."

His point, although he didn't mention anyone by name, also was this: Not to worry, George, even if much of the spring looked like a disaster from where the Boss sat, too.

First, it was the subtle suggestion, understood by everyone, that perhaps the team should pay particular attention to beating Tampa Bay in an exhibition in mid-March. Steinbrenner apparently wanted it to be a "message" game, something to let the locals know just exactly who really owns the city of Tampa. Steinbrenner's second home. But the Yankees blew a late lead and lost.

Then, after another couple of losses, it was a high-level meeting in a Tampa restaurant, the same restaurant in which he met with his staff to strong-arm the Roger Clemens-for-David Wells trade a little more than a year ago. This time the topic apparently was Anaheim's Jim Edmonds, who might have provided the left-handed power and outfield play to fill the holes left by Darryl Strawberry's suspension, Chili Davis' retirement and the inability of Ricky Ledee or Shane Spencer to lay claim once and for all to left field. (Edmonds likely would have played center for the Yankees, moving Bernie Williams to left.) Torre and General Manager Brian Cashman talked Steinbrenner down from that ledge, and the Angels ultimately traded Edmonds to St. Louis.

Finally, it was another hastily called staff meeting several days later, again after a stretch in which the Yankees didn't win. This time, the session was a late-night confab at Legends Field in the wake of a poor outing by projected fifth starter Ed Yarnall, who was ticketed as the replacement for Hideki Irabu (now with Montreal).

Still, no major panic buttons were pushed. Why? Because Torre was around to say, in effect, "I'm thinking of how we can win every game." Any big deal the Yankees might have made likely would have cost them the pitching on which Torre depends. And, as it usually does under Torre's guidance, the ship righted its course in time. The Yankees won seven consecutive games in the final 10 days of the spring. This is one reason the Women's lax rolled by green

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

Dartmouth College closed the bank on the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team yesterday, as the Minutewomen fell to No. 9 Dartmouth College, 10-6.

The Big Green struck first when senior Kate Graw scored an unassisted goal just a minute and a half in. Another Dartmouth senior found the back of the net when Melissa Frazier tallied off an assist by Jacque Weitzal, blasting a shot by UMass goalie Jen Nardi.

The Minutewomen came back, with two goals within a minute of each other when freshman Kelli Kurtz put the ball past Dartmouth goalie Ellie Leahy, and junior Rachel Ingraffea followed suit by finishing a feed from senior Stephanie Pavlick just 12 seconds later.

The game was tied going into the tenth minute, before Dartmouth broke it open. Three more unassisted goals finished out the Big Green's run in the first half, as Weitzal put two more points on the board, and Frazier scored her second goal of the night.

UMass closed out the half at 5-4 when Pavlick fed the sphere to senior Rebecca Minaker for her ninth goal of the season. Minutes later, Minaker broke in on a fast break shooting on Leahy, who made the save. However, she couldn't find an answer for junior Fay Naber, who planted the rebound into the net.

The Big Green scored quickly to open the second half, but UMass was able to answer back. Dartmouth broke open the second half with two goals, twenty seconds apart. Graw scored her second unassisted goal of the afternoon, and Junior Suzy Gibbons followed her lead with 28:26 left on the clock. A minute later UMass bounced back with Pavlick's first goal, at 27:21.

As the second half wound down, Dartmouth tallied up three more goals, which proved to be an insurmountable advantage for the Minutemen to overcome. The New Hampshire squad took control of the game for the next ten minutes, keeping the ball in UMass' end of the field.

Weitzel finished off her hat trick, weaving in through the UMass defenses to score an unassisted goal at 24:06. Also nabbing a hat trick for Dartmouth was Graw, who posted her third goal at 14:04.

The Big Green's final goal came off a well-developed play that gave sophomore Alison Moulin the feed from junior Amy Zimmer.

Minaker scored her team-high second goal of the afternoon, an unassisted shot at 6:22. The nets would go untouched for the final moments, as the teams fought for control in the last six minutes.

UMass was dominated throughout much of the game, winning only 15 of the 48 groundballs, and controlling only 6 of ten draws.

Nardi had a decent game, making eight saves of the 22 shots on goal the Big Green took.

Leahy saved 10 of the 20 shots she faced.

"The kids played awesome, the defense played like they can. Just a tremendous game, and what an effort," head coach Phil Barnes said after the game.

The Minutewomen hoped to oust their neighbors at Garber, but there was too much Big Green in Dartmouth's 10-6 matinee victory.

Woods, Duval were once neck-and-neck

By Shaun Powell
Newsday

AUGUSTA, GA – He may have to swing with one hand this week because too many people are kissing the other. He's everywhere at Augusta National: in the middle of the gallery, on the front page of the paper, and, most of all, banging inside the heads of his competitors like a 4 a.m. wakeup call.

The Masters prides itself on being a cut above the rest, and yet compelling evidence says it could wind up just another routine stop on the Tiger Woods Tour.

Woods comets into this event without feeling the resistance of brakes or a rival. No other golfer is better qualified to win. Nobody brings more momentum. With Woods more focused and frightening than ever, the race for second should be a thriller.

His aura of invincibility is creating a larger presence over the historic course than the giant magnolia trees. At 24 he is the undisputed king of golf, the probabitive favorite at the Masters, and the player least likely to pull a Greg Norman.

"Any event he plays in is Tiger's event to win," David Duval said. "Not too long ago, that was the case with me."

Has it really been a year ago when Duval, not Woods, caused this kind of stir at August 2? Lost somewhere in the rubble of Tigermania is the trampled crown once worn by Duval, whose No. 1 ranking seems older than Arnold Palmer. But it's true: At the start of last year's Masters, there was Duval on the cover of Sports Illustrated, blowing on a smoldering putter, a symbol that reflected his surge through the sport.

His rise to the top was quick and easy. In the months before the Masters, Duval won four titles. He shot a 59, eagling the final hole, at the Bob Hope Classic. He needed only eight starts to set the tour earnings record. At the same time Duval charged into the Masters, there were doubts, amazingly, swirling around Woods.

Things changed, and rather drastically, for both. The Duval Dive began shortly after Augusta, where he tied for sixth. The second half of his year was quiet, saved only by the Ryder Cup win, and he comes to the Masters a few days after finishing 73rd at the BellSouth. Meanwhile, Woods has finished first or second in 10 of his last 11 events. Since Duval's last victory, Woods has 10 tour wins and a firm grip around golf's neck.

In the absence of a rival for Woods, you'd think Duval would be anxious to be the buzz again. Except Duval, oddly, seems to want no part of that. He's not sharing the same zip code with Woods, and gives the impression that it's fine with him.

son? Although it's hard to ignore that both teams haven't been playing up to par as of late, strong regular seasons by both indicate that this will be a close series. Both teams have weapons at their disposal; expect them to be exhausted time and again.

No. 4 Philadelphia vs. No. 5 Florida: Pavel Bure is a huge reason why Florida is here, so expect him to shoulder the load as the Panthers make a run. Mike Vernon is a playoff-tested goaltender, and if he can rediscover his game, it will go a long way in helping Florida make a push. Philadelphia is again a solid club, but with question marks looming over Eric Lindros and the goalie situation – a position the untested Brian Boucher may fill – this one could easily swing either way.

Western Conference:

No. 1 St. Louis vs. No. 8 San Jose: The Sharks have played well, most notably goaltender Steve Shields who pitched a shutout Monday against the Oilers. However, it will take a miracle for them not to get rolled over by the train that is St. Louis. The Sharks haven't played consistently enough to hang with a high-octane club like the Blues, and will most likely find themselves singing them after a short postseason stint.

No. 2 Dallas vs. No. 7 Edmonton: The Oilers are a team that likes to wear out their welcome, so don't expect Dallas to roll. On the other hand, don't expect the Stars to fold; the defending Stanley Cup champs are again a strong club that remains deep enough to make a serious run at the Cup. An upset here seems unlikely.

No. 3 Colorado vs. No. 6 Phoenix: The Coyotes remain an enigmatic team, able to beat the best one day, and lose miserably the next. The series will linger on what side of them decides to show up. The Avalanche have been strong, clinching the Northwest Division and having won five straight as of Wednesday. They also have Ray Bourque, who has been huge in lifting morale and point production since his arrival in Colorado. Joe Sakic casts as large shadow as well, and the hopes of the Ianche may well hinge on his performance.

No. 4 Detroit vs. No. 5 Los Angeles: Sorry, L.A., but don't take that No. 5 ranking as an automatic ticket that will take you far into the postseason. The Kings have been riddled with inconsistency and injury – Bryan Smolinski is just the latest to fall. No matter what the Wings do during the season, it's always hard to count them out, and this year is no different.

There, for better or worse, are the teams that will most likely play on while teams like the Boston Bruins reserve tee times. To choose the Stanley Cup champions is like rolling dice; so many possibilities, and no definitive way of knowing what will turn up. However, everyone is entitled to take a stab at who they think will go all the way, and I stand humbly before you now with mine.

Eastern Conference Champions: Toronto Maple Leafs. It's a tough call to make, but I take the Leafs because they have a stellar goaltender in Curtis Joseph, while a team like Philly comes in with an unproven commodity between the pipes. Toronto is strong everywhere, but it is Culo that ultimately sets them apart.

Western Conference Champions: St. Louis Blues. As good as Dallas and Detroit are, and as much as the Avalanche have improved, the Blues seem to have been ordained from day one.

Stanley Cup Champions: St. Louis. In the end, the Blues are simply better than the next team. Although Toronto has the better goaltending, St. Louis has too many weapons that can handle what the opposition throws at them. The Blues have depth, experience and talent, enough so they will be the last team standing.

Road leading to NFL much like lottery

By Dan Pompei
The Sporting News

Calling a football player a "workout warrior" is somewhat derisive. Kind of like calling a soldier a "boot camp hero."

It's easy to stereotype all so-called workout warriors such as running back Curtis Keaton of James Madison, receiver Chris Coleman of North Carolina State and defensive end Adalius Thomas of Southern Mississippi and conclude they are athletes, not football players. But we need to look at each workout warrior individually and rate his draft value because one often has little in common with the next. Everyone remembers workout warrior busts Mike Mamula, John Thierry, Tebucky Jones and Trey Junkin. But some workout warriors have gone on to become great pros such as Terrell Davis, John Mobley, Eric Swann and Todd Collins (the linebacker, not the quarterback).

The key is objectively interpreting workout data as it relates to performance on the field. And that is easier to theorize about than to execute.

When a player has a surprisingly impressive workout, the first reaction should not be to move him up three rounds on the draft board. It should be a re-evaluation.

"If you didn't like him the first time, maybe you have to make sure you didn't miss something and look at the tape again," Seahawks vice president of football operations Ted Thompson says. "It's also possible you never even saw him. Sometimes guys get rated poorly in the fall because scouts assume they won't run fast enough, or that they aren't athletic enough. Workouts can make you aware of guys who might have otherwise slipped through the cracks."

If the tape shows the player consistently performing poorly, the good workout probably is a false indicator, an ominous bark from a small dog. A workout should reaffirm athletic skills that are evident on game film. For instance, it was no surprise when Southern Cal receiver R Jay Soward ran a 4.35 40-yard dash at the combine because nobody in the Pac-10 could catch him.

But it doesn't always work so cleanly. There are reasons players don't always show their athleticism on the field that need to be taken into consideration.

Sometimes the player is poorly coached in college. This is particularly possible with small-school players. And many workout warriors such as defensive end John Milem of Lenoir-Rhyne (a Division II school in North Carolina), are from smaller schools. Then again, those who failed to produce against a lower level of college competition have little chance of producing against NFL competition, regardless of coaching.

Sometimes the offensive or defensive scheme used at the player's college doesn't bring out the best in him. This was true with Jevon Kearse, a workout warrior who was a much better NFL player as a rookie for the Titans last year than he was at Florida. In order to focus on what Kearse did best, Titans personnel men Ron Hughes and Kevin Colbert (now of the Steelers) did a tape cut-up of Kearse's pass rushes at Florida eliminating all the plays in which he dropped. They then were able to see the production to match the athleticism.

Sometimes the player is not playing his best pro position in college. Last year the Bears selected a workout warrior who was a productive small-college running back and turned him into a cornerback. At 5-10, 195, former New Hampshire star Jerry Azumah was too small to play running back in the NFL but he was big enough for corner. So far, it looks like a good move.

Sometimes the players around him don't allow him to be all he can be. In 1970 Bill Walsh, then an assistant under Paul Brown in Cincinnati, went to see the workout of a quarterback for a Division III team with a 4-4 record. He was the biggest player on the team. "I still remember him throwing to me in his school's gym," Walsh says. "You could see a quick delivery, how much control he had and his athleticism. He ran a 4.6 40-yard dash. The workout made a major impression on me." Walsh convinced the Bengals to invest a third-round pick on the kid the next spring. And Ken Anderson turned out to be a pretty fair NFL player.

The type of drills a player excels in also can be telling. For instance, a short shuttle is more revealing of a defensive lineman's skills than a 40-yard dash. A player can become known as a workout warrior by excelling in tests that don't measure his ability to play his position.

What may be more valuable than all the tests are the positional drills players go through at the behest of coaches and scouts. Many teams had questions about the athleticism of Boston College defensive tackle Chris Hovan until he performed in those drills specific to defensive tackles. "All of the tests – the runs and jumps – can be practiced and rehearsed," Bucs General Manager Rich McKay says. "You can improve the numbers. What matters more is the athleticism you see in the drills. They are much harder to rehearse."

Workouts for each position need to be evaluated differently. For instance, a great workout by an offensive lineman should be regarded more lightly than a great workout by a wide receiver. Why? Because athleticism matters much less to the former than it does the latter. Workouts also can be revealing for tight ends. "When you test them, you can see them do some things they didn't have much of a chance to do in games because a lot of them come from run-oriented offenses," says Ravens vice president of personnel Ozzie Newsome, a Hall of Fame tight end.

Although Anderson distinguished himself to Walsh in a workout, the test results for many workout warrior quarterbacks is the scouting equivalent of fool's gold. See Browning Nagle.

Still, the workout warrior is a temptation as difficult to resist as dessert on the house. The regrets come later.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — You can be a little more unpredictable today without threatening your current position one bit. Have a little fun with your own routine endeavors.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — You can expect others to watch you faithfully throughout the day today as you attempt to accomplish something that others have only imagined.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You have the answer today, but you may not know it just yet. Soon, you'll realize that you're sitting pretty right now.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — You'll be plying your trade even during your time off today — by making plans and looking forward to a coming opportunity.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — A curiosity of sorts is likely to form today as a result of mistaken identity — and your own confusion over what is really going on not far from home.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Don't be impatient today, your turn will come. In the meantime, you can do much to aid and support those who are currently in the spotlight.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — This is a good day for you to do everything you can to make up for an unintentional offense that perhaps puts some things out of reach.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — You may actually be too eager to remember someone close to you today. There is no reason to concentrate more on your own needs at this time.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — You mustn't let others hold you to comments made in the heat of passion over the past few days. You have the freedom to change your mind.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — You're knee deep in something that you still can't quite figure out — but you're getting closer each and every day.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — Your luck is about to change, but if you play your cards right you needn't be fortune's fool. You must play a more controlling role.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — A move may be in the picture — if not now, then surely in the near future. It's time to prepare for your new role in a new environment.

Blues sing, rest of NHL sees red

The road to the Stanley Cup playoffs is a battle-scarred path, a convoluted passage that even the most talented of clubs find hard to navigate at times. Over the course of an 82-game season, the makeup of a team is altered as players fall prey to injury, are traded, and simply weather the physical demand of playing professional hockey eight months a year. With only two days left in the regular season, teams still in the hunt will be looking for a second wind, because for all intent and purposes, the season starts now.

A look at the standings reveals a more focused picture of who will be competing after April 9, with all the usual suspects in place and a few surprises in the mix as well. The final placement of these squads will not be settled until the last game has been played on Sunday, however. If the season ends with all concerned parties holding onto their current slot, the 2000 edition of the Stanley Cup Playoffs should look something like this.

Eastern Conference:

No. 1 New Jersey vs. No. 8 Buffalo: This matchup often proves to be the most intriguing of the playoffs, with the number one seed riding a wave of confidence, and the eighth seed playing with nothing to lose. These are the Devils and Sabres, however. New Jersey tends to play themselves into an early exit, while nobody loves to play the spoiler more than Buffalo.

No. 2 Washington vs. No. 7 Pittsburgh: The Penguins have Jaromir Jagr, and a Jagr at 80 percent is more than most teams have to begin with. Is Ron Tugnutt a playoff goaltender? His numbers are fine during the regular season, but post-season play is a different animal altogether. The Capitals have a strong roster, and Adam Oates is playing like a kid again.

No. 3 Toronto vs. No. 6 Ottawa: Could it be? Two Canadian teams still exist, and they meet in the post-sea-

Catcher powers Minutemen

The Massachusetts baseball team was running on all cylinders in New Britain, CT yesterday afternoon, pounding Central Connecticut State University for 16 hits on their way to a 10-2 victory.

Minuteman catcher Chris Morgan was the spark that got the UMass offense rolling, hitting a key home run that pushed the Minutemen (11-9) ahead for good. With the loss, the Central Connecticut Blue Devils drop to 9-15 overall.

Tied at zero with one out in the third inning, sophomore Scott Anderson ripped a double down the left field line. Two batters later, with two outs on the board, Morgan stepped up and blasted his third homer of the season over the right-center field fence. The two-run shot put the Minutemen up 2-0, a lead they would not relinquish.

The Blue Devils attempted the comeback, scoring one run in the bottom of the third to cut the lead in half, but as the innings added up the Minutemen got stronger. The Central Connecticut effort was too little, too late, as the Devils added only one more run in the bottom of the ninth.

Leading the Minuteman offense yesterday afternoon was senior Kevin O'Connell. The first baseman collected four hits in the game, including his second triple of the season. Anderson followed up a 2-for-3 effort on Sunday against Dayton by scoring three UMass runs. He also collected three hits and two runs batted in on the afternoon. Morgan ended the day batting 2-for-5, with two runs scored and three RBI. The sophomore catcher has been a consistent force on the Minuteman roster this season. Heading into the game, Morgan was hitting .369, good for second on the team. He's also been solid behind the plate, having caught seven runners on the base paths heading into yesterday's action.

Sophomore pitcher Brian Hourigan remained undefeated on the year, upping his record to 2-0. Hourigan scattered five hits through seven innings, walking two and fanning two batters en route to the victory. Matt Nelson took the loss for Central Connecticut, dropping his record to 1-2 on the year.

The last time Hourigan tasted victory was back on March 16th against LaSalle, when he finished what Travis Veracka started, pitching five innings, allowing three hits and striking out seven.

Although his pitching since the LaSalle game has been solid, Hourigan has seen his work go for not as the Minutemen failed to produce runs past the middle innings. On March 29th against the Huskies of Connecticut, Hourigan spread six hits out over six innings, striking out four Huskies and allowing three runs. The 4-2 lead he left his team with was surrendered, however, when Nick Skirkanich came in and let up six hits and three runs in two plus innings of work. His effort was finally rewarded yesterday, however, as his teammates' bats came to life and gave him a comfortable lead to work with.

The timing of the offense to gel and put up a large run count couldn't have been better. The Minutemen will host Virginia Tech this weekend in a three game series that will go a long way in testing the character of coach Mike Stone's club. The Hokies (18-12-2) will bring with them a potent offense that will keep the UMass pitching staff working overtime. They have four players hitting over .300 including sophomore Chris Hutchinson, who is batting .370 and leading the team with six homeruns and 25 RBI.

The first pitch of the Saturday doubleheader against Virginia Tech is scheduled for noon.

Big Cahoon-ah

UMass hockey coach named

Former Princeton coach Dan Cahoon was named the head coach of the Massachusetts hockey team last night at the Weston Hotel in Providence, RI, the site of this weekend's Frozen Four.

Don Cahoon

Cahoon, who had been the head coach of the Tigers for the past nine seasons, helped to turn around the Princeton program during his time in New Jersey. During that span, Cahoon led the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference member school to a 20-win season in 1998-99, three 18-win campaigns, and the Tigers only trip to the NCAA tournament. Those four seasons were the only winning ones for the Princeton program since 1967.

Now the Minutemen hope that the Bay State native can complete another resurgence like the one he created at Princeton.

"I think I can speak for my family and all my good friends in Massachusetts and say, it's an honor and a privilege to coach and lead the UMass hockey program into a new chapter" said Cahoon in a press release. "I'm looking forward to getting the program headed in the right direction to be competitive within Hockey East and on the national level. Everyone can rest assured that I will lead the program with the state's best interests in mind."

Cahoon earned the job after a list of candidates was comprised to replace former Minutemen coach Joe Mallen. During his seven years in Amherst, Mallen helped to rebuild a program that was reinstated in 1993. However, the University decided last month that it would not renew his contract when it expires in May.

"We're pleased to have a person of Coach Cahoon's stature in the hockey world as a part of our program," said UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum in a press release. "He has a proven record of success everywhere he has coached. We had several outstanding candidates for the position, so it's evident that the head-coaching job at UMass is a very desirable one. We feel confident Don is the person who can instill the winning tradition of UMass athletics to the hockey program."

Other coaches rumored to be in the hunt for the vacancy included those from three fellow Hockey East rivals - New Hampshire's Dick Umile, Maine's Shawn Walsh and Merrimack coach Chris Serino.

Niagara coach Blaise MacDonald was also a likely candidate after guiding the Purple Eagles to the NCAA tournament this season, but withdrew his name from consideration earlier yesterday. Umile was also interviewed late last week, but also withdrew his name from consideration.

Cahoon, a 1972 graduate of Boston University, has had extensive coaching experience at the collegiate level. Before his stint at Princeton, he was the head coach at Lehigh University (1973-74) and Norwich University (1979-82), as well as an assistant at BU and UMass-Lowell. For his head-coaching career at the aforementioned three schools, Cahoon has an overall mark of 180-167-36.

As a team, UMass lost only four seniors to graduation and will return a huge core junior and sophomores next year. Among the notables include brothers Jeff and Tim Turner, who were first and third on the team in scoring this year with 34 and 26 points respectively, and junior goalie Markus Helanen.

Mosby's legacy will long be remembered

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

STATE COLLEGE, PA – The embrace between Mandy Mosby and coach Dave Kuzara told the entire story.

Following the senior's final attempt on the vault at last weekend's NCAA Region 3 Championships, the Lilburn, GA native walked a few steps into her coach's arms. It was at that point that both athlete and coach realized that they had just witnessed the end of an era in UMass women's gymnastics.

During her four years in Amherst, Mosby has practically rewritten the UMass record books. Her individual accomplishments read like a laundry list, earning recognition for work both in the gym and in the classroom.

"It's going to be a strange feeling next year without her. The past four years have gone by so fast," Kuzara said. "I hope that she knows what she has meant to us, but actually, I am very confident that she does."

For her final collegiate meet, Mosby competed at the regional championships at Penn State University as one of six individuals who had reached Happy Valley via that route. Overall, Mosby finished with a composite score of 38.225, with a high mark of 9.725 on the floor exercises.

After a solid start to the night, posting a 9.625 on the bars, the two-time Atlantic 10 Gymnast of the Year encountered some difficulty on the balance beam. A problematic dismount cost Mosby a shot at a high score – and the chance to advance to the NCAA Championships in the process.

"I can say that I was pleased with my performance. Obviously, I was disappointed with my beam dismount," Mosby said. "But I did the best that I could and came back strong after the beam."

Added Kuzara: "Mandy had a very strong start on the beam, and it was flawless until her dismount. It was disappointing because I really thought that she had a chance to win the event and go to the NCAAs."

Regardless of her finish at Penn State last weekend, the fact of the matter is that the diminutive gymnast enjoyed an outstanding four-year career at UMass.

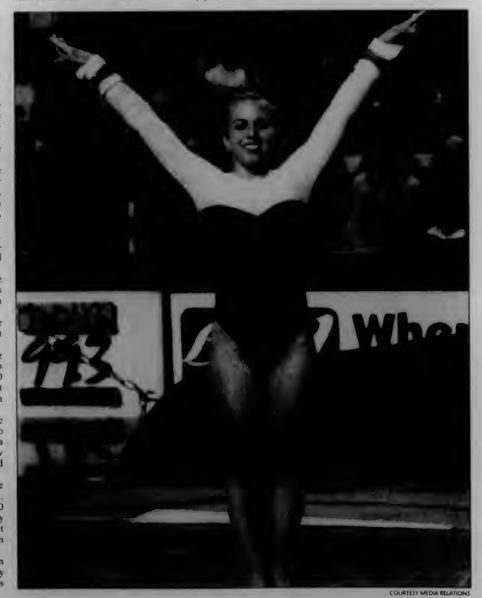
As a freshman, Mosby burst onto the scene by winning the A-10 Rookie of the Year award after a tremendous rookie campaign. A year later, she earned A-10 Gymnast of the Year honors and was the Northeast Regional balance beam champion after scoring an impressive 9.875.

In her junior campaign, Mosby once again claimed the honor of conference Gymnast of the Year and also placed 10th in the all-around at the regionals with a score of 37.950. Finally, as a senior, Mosby set a new UMass record in the all-around and once again reached the Region 3 Championships.

For the record, the Peach State product will leave UMass at the top of the charts in the all-around. Mosby's score of 39.375 at this year's A-10 Championships broke the old mark that was set by Tara Swartz in 1997. She also has the third highest individual scores on the balance beam (9.90) and on the floor exercises (9.975).

Unfortunately, Mosby's days of donning the Maroon and White are now just a memory. But that's not to say that she hasn't left an indelible mark on the UMass women's gymnastics program.

"It hasn't really hit me yet that my college career is over. This is something that I've been doing my whole life," Mosby said. "Of course, there's been a lot of individual accomplishments along the way, awards and that type, but it would have been nice to have had the team here [at Penn State]."



However, what separates Mosby from the average gymnast is the accolades that the senior has earned for her work in the classroom. She is a three-time Coaches Academic All-America Selection and maintains a 3.79 grade point average in management.

"She's done everything that she could have possibly done [while at UMass] and this year, she really put her heart and soul into it," Kuzara said. "I'm very pleased that she decided to come here."

Added Mosby: "I'm so pleased that I decided to come here. It's something that just has been confirmed over and over again. I have no regrets about coming here, and I have no doubt that I made the right choice."

For now, Mosby will finish her degree before exploring other options regarding the sport that she has been engulfed in for the majority of her life.

"I never really liked coaching, but I'd really like to stay involved with the sport, even if it's just judging," she said.

The smallest package has delivered the biggest punch, but unfortunately UMass women's gymnastics now must move on without Mandy Mosby.

North lectures in FAC lobby

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

JANET BARRY/COLLEGIAN

Oliver North spoke to a crowed room of students and staff, yesterday, in the lobby of the Fine Arts Center

The crowd gathered closest to the podium in the Fine Arts Center lobby cheered for Oliver North. The crowd at the back of the room split their decision on his speech, and the crowd outside shouted during the whole lecture.

North's noontime speech, sponsored in part by the UMass Republican Club, packed the Fine Art's Center lobby. Members of the Republican Club searched people's belongings outside the front door while protestors gathered in a roped off area.

Jovial about the protest, North seemed unworried about the small group opposing him.

"I've been shot at by people more angry than this. None of this concerns me," North said. He later added, " I've seen men die face down in the mud supporting their right to protest, so I hope to I'll see the expression of free speech continue here today."

Saying that he would speak anywhere that invited him, North spent his first hour on the UMass campus at the Stockbridge Faculty Club, schmoozing with members of the Republican Club and members of various on-campus ROTCs. Shaking hands and asking questions, North worked his way through the room before posing for photographs, signing autographs and answering questions.

Leaving Stockbridge, North entered the lobby area from the FAC's backdoors to a partially standing ovation. He joked with those in attendance that when he saw the protestors, he hadn't felt so welcome since "I was last asked to testify before Congress."

He asked that those in attendance would only listen to his message, not endorse his beliefs. He warned before he spoke that he wasn't the man that was being "protested outside." Rather, he said that he was a broadcaster, a columnist and an author.

His speech focused around the upcoming presidential campaign and the census. However, North began with a history lesson for the gathered.

"I served the greatest president of my lifetime, Ronald Reagan," North said, introducing himself before beginning his speech in full. He said that today's media kept "us uninformed."

"The media is a business for young people, by young people, and if you don't believe me, look at television," North said. "That media will cover the most important election year of your lives."

He said that never before had so many Republicans challenged for the top spot in the party, 12, as had this past year, adding that never had so many Democrats challenged for their top spot, two. North felt that this election would also be important because of this year's census.

"These events [the presidential election and the census] coincide only every twenty years, and history will show how important this coming together is," North said.

North spoke of 1860 – the year the first Republican was elected to office and the census being taken, speaking of how radically America would change during the Civil War that soon followed. He then asked that everyone fast forward to 1960.

"A son of this state promised a change that saw government as a solution. As one side result, there were four new Supreme Court justices chosen and 307 Federal judges. His was the vision of an activist," North said.

He noted that there were positives to Kennedy and Johnson's administration, including the passing of voter rights and Civil Rights legislation, but the positives stopped there.

"This increased the intrusiveness into state rights – they also gave us international conflict where we were able to win every battle and lost the war and we're still recovering from that," North said.

In 1980, he said Reagan became the first president to propose attempts to roll back Communism across the world. As he was making this point, protestors outside became quite audible, shouting various things that filtered into the packed lobby.

He suggested to attendees that they approach these elections with informed opinions and gave fifteen questions that everyone could consider asking of their candidates, including whether or not candidates supported tax cuts.

"Should e-commerce be taxed? Should porn be protected by the Constitution? Does the second amendment protect individual or group rights?" North asked, also encouraging people to ask if Roe-vs-Wade was the right decision, what government departments should be cut back, should companies like Microsoft be broken up, should drugs be legalized, what is an acceptable solution for Social Security and Medicare.

"These are important questions for all of you. If you look, your cohorts in office will be able to affect these things, but yet, you don't vote. Eleven percent of you bothered to vote," North said, emphasizing the word bothered. "You are allowing others to make decisions for you."

He said that he was encouraged by, if nothing else, students that showed up to protest his arrival, but wondered if they cared about his lecture why they didn't care enough to vote.

"Find a browser an issue that drives you and motivates you. The future is far too important for others to decide," North said. "I challenge you to engage yourself in this election."

Warm applause greeted the end of his lecture before North began answering questions, including queries about his history. He was asked why Americans should be allowed to fight their revolution but Sandanistas couldn't fight Somoza in El Salvador, why he had been charged with drug trafficking, whether or not American soldiers should serve under foreign generals and where he had the moral authority to speak about democratic issues.

The questions were equally divided between those that supported him and those that didn't, but he answered all questions, correcting information when necessary and listening to follow-up questions.

At 1:20 p.m., North excused himself from the lecture to the clapping of most of those gathered

Players implicated in weekend brawl

By Jason Trankle

Some members of the University of Massachusetts men's football team was involved in an altercation with non-members that broke out last Sunday around 1 a.m. in the Peking Gardens parking lot off Route 9 in Hadley.

According to Associate Athletic Director Bill Strickland, he said he was not aware of the incident as of yesterday, but stated that upon receiving the news, he contacted Coach Mark Whipple.

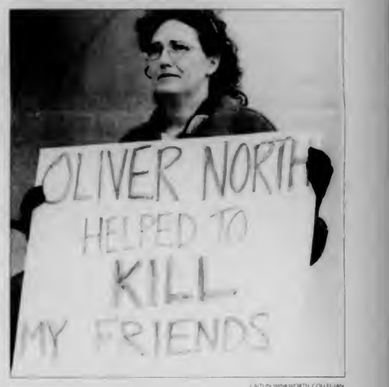
"We know there was definitely an incident. We talked to Coach Whipple and he and his staff are talking to the team to get some more information," Strickland said. "Until we get more facts that is basically all we can say at this point."

Whipple was out-of-state attending meetings and was unavailable for comment.

The Hadley town and Massachusetts State Police responded to the scene. According to Hadley Police Chief Dennis Hukowicz, authorities are not wishing to disclose much information about the possible circumstances leading up to the incident. He said the fact that there were no witnesses to the event, is making it extremely difficult for authorities to re-enact the incident and understand what exactly happened.

"Nobody saw anything and that's why we're trying to reach out," Hukowicz said. "If anyone has information about the incident, we'd like to hear from them."

According to police records, the Incident involved a male being assaulted and beaten. The victim's gold necklace and pendant were stolen. Hukowicz stated. He was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital and treated for possible lacerations. Hukowicz said his records indicated that the victim was a student.



Hukowicz stated that he was aware of an anonymous e-mail that was sent to WBZ TV 4 News clearly describing "a group of fcetball players" involved in a large violent dispute with non-members.

A representative from Channel 4 said they received the e-mail over their anonymous e-mail hotline, but for confidentiality reasons, they could not be specific in regard to what the e-mail described.

"I'm getting calls from different newspapers and Channel 4 that they were sent an e-mail stating that a football team was involved," Hukowicz said. "I haven't seen the e-mail so I don't know what exactly was said."

According to a UMass football player, who wisher to remain anonymous, the altercation was provoked by some non-members harassing some of the female friends of the

Sigma Phi Epsilon to return to house in fall

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

After a three-semester absence, brothers in the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity will be moving back into their house starting next fall.

President Hernan Picalomino and Vice-President Jonathan Moore both said they were excited about being able to move back into a house and starting a new era of their fraternity life.

Members of Sigma Phi Epsilon were forced to move out of their house in the spring of 1998 because they did not have enough brothers to sustain life in the building. Hernan explained that after leaving the house, the fraternity got together and expelled members who were inactive or there solely for social reasons.

The group was then left homeless and with only ten remaining brothers. That is, until they started implementing the "Balance Man Program." Picalomino and Moore credit this program for their recent recruiting success.

The "Balance Man Program" is a member development program designed to acclimate new members to the fraternity. There is no pledging period and therefore no hazing. Rather, new members are initiated slowly in weekly chapter meetings, risk management, stress management and resume building sessions.

Moore said of his experience in the program, "I thought it was great. It barely took up any of my time and I learned a lot of valuable chapter information."

Hernan added, "We get a lot more quality group. We want everyone to participate right away."

Using the program, Phi Sigma Epsilon recruited 23 members the following spring and now have 48 members as they prepare to enter their new house.

Picalomino and Moore said they look for "friends of friends" when they start recruiting, but that they don't discriminate against anyone. In fact, they explained that they are looking for kids who normally wouldn't join a fraternity.

"We're trying to kill the frat boy image," Moore said.

This process includes holding regular information sessions, where they sit down with prospective members and talk for half-hour to an hour about chapter requirements. The fraternity stresses academics and recognize that students are here to graduate. For example, every year the fraternity offers a "Balance Man Scholarship" to an incoming freshman, with no obligation to join.

When asked about their somewhat unique approach to recruiting, Picalomino said, "We would like for the whole Greek area [to do this], but that's up to them."

"This is what works best for us," Moore added.

Community service is also a key component for Phi Sigma Epsilon and a requirement for new members. Picalomino said that every new member

Palden Gaysto, a Tibetan Monk, pauses for a moment in silence, during the speech he gave in the Campus Center Auditorium last night, discussion the 33 years he spent imprisoned at the hands of the Chinese Government

Tibetan monk speaks to full house

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

Palden Gyatso, the Tibetan monk who endured 33 years of torture in a Chinese-run prison, spoke to a full house in the Campus Center Auditorium last night.

After a brief introduction by the organizer of the event, Matt Kozuch, in which Gyatso's experiences were described as "things that I cannot imagine," the 67 year-old monk spoke through his interpreter, Namkha Tenzin.

Born in 1933, Gyatso entered a monastery at the age of 10, a time when there was not a Chinese presence in Tibet.

When the Communist Party took power in China in 1949, the Chinese military immediately invaded Tibet.

The Chinese originally came into the country with the intent to help Tibet in its development, according to Gyatso.

The Tibetans held "the first political uprising in the history of Tibet" on March 10, 1959, Gyatso said.

"On that very day, without any sort of organization, the common people rose against the Chinese," he continued.

Gyatso was arrested for his participation in the protest and thrown into a make-shift prison that had originally been a monastery.

He was released in 1992 through the efforts of an Italian chapter of Amnesty International. Given only one tin cup of broth a day, Gyatso and other prisoners were forced to eat what they could find. Rats, insects, grass, leather belts and shoes were all consumed in the prisoner's efforts to survive. Chinese guards forced labor on the prisoners for upward of nine hours a day, sometimes even using them as "human oxen" to pull plows in the fields.

"When the political prisoners sometimes, from lack of nutrition, cannot pull the plow and they fell down, the Chinese come over and they start beating the political prisoners," Gyatso said through Tenzin. "And then they [would] bring a rope and they would tie the hands and legs of that political prisoner."

The Chinese guards would place a branch through the tied arms and legs and they would carry him or her away.

"We try to do about 500 hours [of community service] per semester," Picalomino said.

Some of the fraternity's recent service projects include Toys for Tots, The Make-a-Wish Foundation, donations to both Cystic Fibrosis and a local blood drive, repairing the Amherst Survival Center and tomorrow's cooperate effort with MassPirg.

When asked why students should consider joining a fraternity or sorority, Picalomino responded, "You get a lot of life experience. A fraternity is like a small business."

Moore also cited networking as one of the main reasons for joining. Through a "Mentor's Program," fraternities and sororities are able to contact former members from all over the country about internships or even potential jobs.

Reps from RSO's meet to consider coalition

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Committee for Student Power presented representatives of many Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) with the plans for a campus-wide coalition at a meeting last night, saying the coalition will allow students to lobby successfully at the state level.

The Committee approached the RSOs because they can provide the mass and diversity sought for the coalition. Although the Committee aims toward a statewide coalition that would include other UMass campuses and Massachusetts universities, the current plans are to internally organize and strengthen the existing RSOs.

BJ Cortis, Committee member and Chair of MassPirg Board of Directors said, "The message is power. There are ideas we all share. We can join together to have an impact on these universal ideas." He added, "We are all activists. Each one of you is doing something you're not getting paid for."

Cortis explained the goal is to take individual RSOs and form a large organization that will have the ability to accomplish things the smaller organizations cannot. Cortis also noted that within the coalition, individual RSOs can benefit from each other through networking. The Committee is planning to hang a calendar of all RSO events in the SGA office, allowing organizers to strategically plan events and keep abreast of what is happening in the student community.

Committee member and SGA Senator Lanell James said, "The main things students are worried about are the quality of our education, the access to our education and the fact that we have no voice to express this in." She also noted the issues afflicting students recently on the UMass campus, from budget cuts to privatization.

She added, "It's not about who we are individually. It's about who we are as a collective whole, what we can do to lobby on the state level."

James said student voice is lacking on the Board of Trustees, which is even more reason to form the coalition. Out of the 22 trustees, only five are students, and only two students may vote on an issue at a time.

She said, in regards to the coalition, "Once home base is solidified, then we start calling UMass Boston."

Student RSO representatives said budget cuts and affirmative action are issues they'd like to see the campus-wide coalition confront.

The Committee is looking toward the defunct State Student Association of Massachusetts (SSAM), an organization that existed in the 1980s and successfully lobbied the state legislature for a cease to tuition increases and assisted in passing bills. Sarah Hamill, Committee member and SGA Chair of Public Policy and Relations, said the Committee will look at the SSAM to build upon their accomplishments and investigate and learn from their failures.

After the meeting, workshops were held by Chris Tarnstrum, SGA Senator, on budget issues. Phil Zetye, also an SGA senator, held a workshop for the student groups who are not yet RSOs, on the benefits of becoming an organization and an explanation on funding. Cortis met with interested RSO representatives to discuss the student bill of rights, which is to be drafted by the Committee.

Community protests lecture; cites North's previous history as reason

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Police barricaded the front doors of the Fine Arts Center lobby yesterday to thwart angry protesters organizing outside from entering into the building and creating a disturbance to guest lecturer Colonel Oliver North.

While inside the Fine Arts Center Lobby, the crowd appeared quiet and attentive to the words of Colonel North; outside protestors filled the air with phrases such as, "Treason!," "A national disgrace," "You can hear him, but you can't believe him," "North belongs in jail" and "Traitor!"

Smith College senior Ann Matney, a philosophy major, turned out to protest the event, but she said it is her belief that many students aren't aware of why students like herself are protesting Oliver North's visit.

"To protest here is to really protest the military intervention in the Middle East and saying as Americans we are aware of what's going on in terms of these images and that we're not behind it," Matney said. "I think people are really concerned with the way that the Pentagon and the way the military has contorted itself and I think there's a lot of frustration over the fact that people really have no control over things that are going on."

Being aware of the military action undertook by the Bush, Reagan and Clinton administrations, she said she is opposed to the United States intervention in Iraq that has been occurring since Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in the 1990s. She said Oliver North is only a part of it.

"We saw Saddam [Hussein] invading Kuwait and we saw this was a good point for us to get a military foothold in the Middle East and that is completely about oil," Matney said.

"We have been killing the Iraqis for the last decade and it's not a fucking issue. For Oliver North, who's been heavily involved in the scandal of running arms to the Middle East, it's just about the corruption in the Pentagon. Oliver North was only a part of that."

Senior art major Walid Zaiter participated in the protest and said he was disappointed that students like himself had to be turned away from the entrance because the lobby had reached capacity.

"I don't understand why we couldn't get in because I'm a student that pays to come here," Zaiter said. "There's plenty of space in there and I tried to go in, but they wouldn't let any of us in."

"Clearly there were some security concerns in relation to the person who was here, but also in terms of the venue," UMass Police Chief John Luippold said. "It reached capacity in regard to those individuals allowed in based upon estimates established by Environmental Health and Safety in conjunction with the [Republican Club] group. Unfortunately, it was necessary to have individuals stay outside."

football players.

"They were saying some dirty things and harassing them," he said. "We went to stick up for one of the girls and the other guy was like, 'fuck you,' and his boys looked like they were going to jump one of my teammates. [The teammate] pushed [a non-member] away because he was getting in his face. The other guy took out a razor blade and he cut one of my teammates a couple times."

He stated that one of the football players got sliced on the face with a razor blade and chaos resulted.

"We didn't do anything wrong and we just wanted to get out of there," he said.

According to police, there is an ongoing investigation into the incident and charges have not been brought against any of the parties involved.

him? They were going to take that political prisoner and bury him alive," Gyatso said. "We see that political prisoner is alive. We see the tears rolling from his eyes, but we cannot do anything, because we are also political prisoners."

Gyatso went on to describe interrogation sessions, in which he would be asked to repeat his statements made about Tibet's free status, with the threat of torture if his answers were incorrect.

During these interrogations, the prisoners were forced to sit upon plates of broken glass and sharpened stones.

Gyatso went on to describe one such interrogation experience: "When the Tibetan political prisoner did not say that Tibet was part of China, then they would start [using] harsher methods of torture. The Chinese would tell the prisoner to get up ... and take off all his clothes," he said. The interrogators would then call in other Chinese security members, who would bring a long rope with them. They would proceed to tie the prisoner into a "human football" and throw the rest of the rope over a ceiling beam, lifting the prisoner off the ground. The guards would light a fire under him and pour boiling water down over the prisoner.

Other forms of torture included using cattle prods on the prisoners in hopes that they would admit that Tibet was in fact under Chinese rule.

"There are two switches," Tenzin translated, holding up an electrical instrument. "If you use the lower switch...it will take 10 minutes for the political prisoner to die or to burn alive. The upper one, if you use the upper switch it will take two minutes for the political prisoner to burn alive or die."

"When they press those switches, when they bring it before you, you can see the sparks," he said. "Sometimes they also use this [the same electrical instrument] and they insert it into the mouth of the political prisoners," Tenzin said. On one such occasion in 1990, when Gyatso was asked if Tibet was independent and did not answer, this happened to him. "Immediately after [regaining consciousness] he saw that there was blood everywhere, urine everywhere, and also that two of his [teeth] were gone." onth, Paldin lost all of his [teeth]," Tenzin said.

SUNY Honors Chair speaks to audience as dean search continues

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The search for a permanent dean of the Commonwealth College continued yesterday, as Ruth Schwartz Cowan, the fourth of five candidates for the position, spoke to students and administrators in the Campus Center.

Cowan currently serves as the Chair of the Honors College at State University of New York [SUNY] at Stony Brook, where she also teaches history.

Cowan began the seminar by discussing her background, and her desire to teach the interdisciplinary courses offered by honors colleges. She described the Honors College at Stony Brook, where she and an administrator are the only faculty members.

"We are so under-funded that there are only two of us to advise 250 students," she said. "Unlike the Dean of the Commonwealth College, I choose my students and the faculty members on my advisory board. I recruit faculty to teach our courses. And I personally meet with every student."

She added that she is looking at positions at other universities "because I was tired of having to argue with my dean over every $5 [that we spend]."

She then opened the floor to questions. Sam Blasiak, a sophomore economics major, asked about the common perception that the Commonwealth College is divisive.

"Many of the other students see it as elitist, promoting differences between students," Blasiak said.

"I've never heard of a public university with an honors college that isn't charged with elitism," Cowan responded.

"According to my understanding," she continued, "the funding that is going to the Commonwealth College is not going to the rest of the University. It is what we call an add-on. It's not as if the money was taken from other programs. But let's say that it was.

"There are a couple of reasons for this -- one is a phenomenon we call raising the bar. The presence of high-achieving, motivated people can make the academic experience better for everyone. The other reason is that a university's prestige comes from what important jobs their alumni have had, and how much money they've given back.

"In America," Cowan continued, "we at public universities are not going to be able to get high-achieving students to enroll without special perks. To compensate them cost-money. I wish we lived in a different world, but that's the world we live in."

Blasiak also asked if she would support the idea of honors dorms, and she said she would not. She noted however, that she supports the SUNY Stony Brook's system of having honors housing that is available to all students.

"Whether I could convince the administration to discontinue this policy [of having Commonwealth-exclusive learning communities], I don't know," she added.

She also stated that allowing Commonwealth students to live in Learning Communities for only one year "does [seem] to make a huge amount of sense."

Cowan was also asked about how she would go about increasing the number of minority students in the Commonwealth College.

"Recruiting high-achieving minorities to a public university is not a race to the top, but it is possible. We need to increase the amount of scholarship money and use cheap recruiting strategies."

When informed by Search Committee Chair Mary Wilson that Massachusetts law does not allow public universities to distribute race-exclusive scholarships, Cowan responded, "Then you don't say [that the scholarships are race-specific]. I'm the stipulator -- you just award and don't know," she added.

Our Opinion
Medicinal overload

Over the past hundred years or so, there have been tremendous advances in the field of medicine. X-rays and their derivatives have been used to diagnose a number of potentially life-threatening illnesses, and surgical techniques have improved beyond our ancestors' wildest expectations. But the most widely used components of modern medicine are prescription drugs.

These days there are thousands of drugs from which to choose. In the early 1900s when our grandparents were just children, a large number of people died from rather simple diseases such as "walking" pneumonia and urinary tract infections. But today, those "primitive" ailments, along with many others, are normally cured with just a small dose of medicine. A few days' worth of an antibiotic and the inflicted can go back to a healthy life.

And what of those suffering from mental illness? In the olden days, there was virtually no treatment for anxiety, depression, schizophrenia or psychosis. But thanks to technological breakthroughs in the world of prescription medicines, there are anti-depressants like Prozac and anti-anxiety drugs like Valium. So essentially, no matter what your ailment– mental or physical – there is most likely a drug on the market designed specifically for you.

While these drugs have both improved the quality of people's lives and actually saved millions of people around the world, some may argue that we as humans have become too dependent on medicinal aides. That is, when we feel the slightest bit of discomfort or pain, we are looking for a quick cure. And sometimes this behavior causes more harm than good.

First off, virtually every drug for mental illness has the potential to be habit-forming. This leads to addiction, potentially severe depression and maybe even overdose or suicide. Sure, many people with legitimate problems need these medicines, but sometimes doctors prescribe them at the drop of a hat. If a young child goes to a psychiatrist with hyperactivity and his mother informs the doctor that he's been doing poorly in school, his initial diagnosis might be Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD). Then the 8-year-old kid gets put on Dexadrine or Ritalin: both class-II drugs along with morphine and other serious medicines.

And what of people (like college students) who, hoping to get an antibiotic, go to the doctor every time they get the sniffles? First of all, if you have a cold, an antibiotic won't do anything – antibiotics cannot cure viral infections. Sure you might feel better after taking the drug, but that might mean your natural immune system has taken care of it for you. Aside from the amount of money that Americans waste on unnecessary antibiotics, there is another major concern about their overuse: antibiotic resistance.

Bacteria, just like humans, evolve. If bacteria are continually exposed to the same drug, they can alter their structures or enzymes and become resistant to it. And that means bad news. For example, if a certain deadly strain of bacteria is only killed by penicillin and then it becomes resistant to it, we have no way of fighting it off and those infected will probably die. Sound too far-fetched? If we keep using antibiotics like they are going out of style, you'll experience it firsthand.

So while it would be ignorant to say that we don't need drugs at all in our society, they should be used more cautiously. Not everyone needs penicillin, and certainly not everyone needs Valium or Prozac. Before the situation becomes completely out of hand, caution on both the parts of physicians and patients needs to be taken now.

So, what would you do?

I'm going to ask you some questions, and I just want you to answer them in your head. Since no one else will know your responses, you can be completely honest and not risk losing face.

Have you ever been assaulted? Do you know anyone who has ever been assaulted? What would you do if you witnessed the assault of a complete stranger...of an acquaintance...of a friend/colleague...of your significant other?

Emily Vacanti

I learned last weekend that many people would just walk by, even if the victim were a colleague or good acquaintance. A couple of the people that I asked said that they would jump in and stop the assault without a second thought. The majority of those I asked said that they would consider doing something and would be more likely to do something if the victim was an acquaintance/colleague. Unfortunately, they stated that it was very unlikely that they would actually do something if the victim were a complete stranger or someone that they did not know too well.

My problem with these answers is that someone could be getting the life beaten out of him, and no one, not one person, would even pause and turn his head slightly to see what was going on. I want to know why.

Everyone on this campus who walks by an assault or a fight and does nothing, not even call the police, is a bit responsible for the well being of the victim – maybe not nearly as much as the assailant, but definitely a bit. Maybe the passerby did not do anything to start or encourage the assault, but he also did nothing to stop it. So the resulting condition of the victim is partly the fault of the people passing by.

This past weekend I was talking to a male friend who I don't see often. I have known him for about two years. I asked him what he would do if someone came up to me and assaulted me in front of him. He said that it wouldn't happen. Yes, you read that correctly. He would actually have the balls to stop it – to do something about it. Now I don't see him more than once a week, and yet he would not let harm come my way. I asked him why not, since most people that I have talked to would let the assault occur. He replied by saying that it would be the right thing to do. Now why can't other people think this way?

"What scares me the most is that most assailants do not think that they are doing anything wrong."

Everyone is so afraid to get into the middle of something that they pretend like it doesn't happen. This is seriously screwed up.

Not to bring up a sore subject, but remember this past November? Remember how there were two assaults in public, one at the pond, and one in front of the Student Union? Do any of you think that maybe these could have been avoided if people would open their damn eyes and acknowledge what happens to be going on around them? Or do you honestly think that nothing could have been done to stop them?

I pose the same question about any assaults on campus. If people would open their eyes to see, and then their mouths to speak or raised their finger to call for help, do you still think that assault would be the problem that it is?

What scares me the most is that most assailants do not think that they are doing anything wrong. They see their expression of anger as perfectly normal and acceptable. They become upset when you run away; they wonder what they could have possibly done wrong. Then they become more upset because they don't see what they did wrong. This is possibly when they go from being the assailant to being the victim. Now they need to be counseled; and the real victim may be ignored. Figures. In this country, it seems like the victim has a tendency to be in the wrong.

So my question still stands: if you saw an assault occurring or about to occur, would you do walk by and ignore it, or have I influenced you to the point that you would either say something and/or call for help? I hope your answer is the latter. Otherwise, assaults will continue in our society.

Your Opinion
Bye Bye Bluewall

For about two years now, a tradition has been occurring Monday nights around the TV at the Bluewall. If you don't know what I am talking about, it is called WWF Raw, which airs on the USA cable network, which is currently not available in the dorm rooms on campus. The number of people coming to the Bluewall to watch Raw has dramatically increased from a few to about 30-45 people, with the crowd increasing in size every week.

This past Monday, the tradition came to a screeching halt. Everyone who works at the Bluewall knows that when Monday night rolls around the big, old, dilapidated T.V. up on the riser belongs to the wrestling fans. It has been this way for a long time. As you may know, last Monday was the NCAA men's college basketball finals. The ratio of people wanting to watch WWF compared to the ones wanting to watch the basketball game was about 1:4, possibly more. Don't get me wrong, college basketball is a great sport and I am not trying to take anything away from it, but if you know anything about the Bluewall, you know that Monday nights are reserved for the wrestling fans. Hell, even I am one of them. I am one of the many and not afraid to say it. I know that some of you out there have thought about coming down to watch with us. Even if you think pro wrestling is the lamest thing in the world, you must say that the fans on Monday nights are very consistent and have an "unalienable right" to watch what they want. Never mind that the basketball game was viewable in every dorm room, or that the management risked creating a very angry mob by telling us to leave. Cooler heads prevailed and we all crammed around the small TV downstairs for two hours.

Let's take one more view on this matter. Call it a businessman's view. The Bluewall does a lot of business during the day, but at night? Who knows? All I know is that on Monday nights (I am no expert on this, but am making reasonable estimates), I would say that the WWF fans bring in anywhere from $150 - $250 worth of business to the Bluewall. Would you want to lose that amount of money over a T.V. programming dispute? Yes, I am asking you to think for a split second. The answer was obvious. Strong "no." We had no idea what they were thinking when they made us leave Monday night. Although the USA network is going to be in the dorms next semester (Thanks, Seth and Jeff), there was some talk of Raw possibly moving to another network. I've also heard unconfirmed rumors of Taco Bell wanting to open a franchise at UMass. If this is the case, I would much rather have Taco Bell take over the space occupied by the Bluewall, where they would respect us and I could buy 3 tacos for $1.50, rather than a big basket of 4 small onion rings for the same price.

Seth's Campus Center Goodbyes

Ah, my installment of the great Daily Collegian tradition of "Notes from the Campus Center Basement." Not that any of you have gone through the time and energy of figuring out that this tradition is traditionally written by graduating seniors, people transferring to other schools or leaving college altogether, but, if you weren't aware, that is the case.

"Notes" is always written by people in their last year, if not semester, of work for the Collegian. With that in mind, I implore you to make assumptions about my status as a UMass student, being that I am writing "Notes".

"But wait," you say, "you're a junior, aren't you?"

Yes, I reply. I am a junior. Still, this is the last time you'll get the chance to read one of my funny, vivacious columns on a Monday...or any other day of the week, for that matter. Regardless of how you feel about the situation, I am terribly saddened by this. On a serious note, I have put my blood, sweat and tears into this newspaper since the second day of my freshman year. At the beginning of my second semester here, I wandered outside of the world of sports writing and over to the field of humor writing, and I've been churning out anecdotes ever since. I hope you've enjoyed them. Here, now, is my final column for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Oh, yeah, the reason I am leaving the Collegian is to take a full-time sports writing job at The Recorder. I'll still be around on campus for the rest of this year, and next year, and well, until I can wrestle my damn degree away from this place. Hey, I've got a great idea; if you see me walking around on campus, why don't you stop me and tell me that you appreciate me and my columns and that you'll miss me severely. Tell me that you'll name your first-born child after me, and that you have surveillance pictures of my bedroom tacked up on your wall. I'm not asking for much here, just show a little respect for a guy who's sad about leaving, okay?

"Go squeeze and suck the day, go carpe diem, baby!"
–Metallica, "Carpe Diem Baby"

I like banana-oriented things, like Ben & Jerry's Chunkey Monkey ice cream. While you're explaining to me about your obsession with my columns, give me a pint of that and I'll be your best friend.

The starting halfback on my high school football team was named Jason Watts. A random slacker at my high school was named Kilo Turcotte. Wouldn't it be just fabulous if the two got married and the second one changed his last name? He'd be a great spokesperson for GE.

"Arrogance and ignorance go hand in hand."
–Metallica, "Holier Than Thou"

My full name is Seth Bradford Koenig. When writing for the Collegian, I've always gone as "Seth Koenig." Bradford is my mother's maiden name, and I am quite close to that side of the family, where my grandparents Pebe and Dahlin reside (not their real names...my older brother, Nate, and I decided that it would be best to create complex code names for them to protect their anonymity in dangerous situations, such as all the time). With this in mind, to respect my mom's side of the family, I went by "S. Bradford Koenig" when writing for The Daily Hampshire Gazette, where I worked during winter break. This creates an interesting question of what I should go by when writing for The Recorder...I'm thinking "Thor, the Mighty Basher-of-Skulls, Koenig," but I'm not quite sure.

Many of you don't know this, but 99.9 percent of all statistics can be used to support any argument you could possibly think of. The remaining 0.1 percent of statistics is used by complete morons who couldn't back an argument up if their lives depended on it. Roughly 78.2 percent of all statistics are completely made up.

What would Jesus do? Why don't you just ask me?

"Don't want your aid, but the fist I've made for years can't hold or feel."

Did any of you ever trade sports cards? I did. I collected football cards, and I can still remember the day of the 50-cent pack, complete with a stick of pink bubble gum that broke your teeth when you tried to chew it. Topps was the first company that I really traded, and they had this strange habit of avoiding action shots in favor of close-ups of the athlete's faces. The expressions that Topps managed to get still amazes me to this day. Aside from all the guys who seemed to be dealing with bowel problems, one player to note was the old Minnesota Vikings quarterback, Tommy Kramer; for four straight years worth of annual cards, Kramer was caught poking his tongue into his cheek to make a bulge in his face.

Student business leaders planning for Entreclub

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

The School of Management may be quiet the week of April 21, as that is the week before the business leaders will put the finishing touches on their business plans for the Entreclub competition.

Entreclub is being put together by Mass Ventures and the UMass Office of Economic Development. The program has been running seminars on Wednesdays and events on Thursdays. It kicked off with a panel discussion with six entrepreneurs, including Jeff Taylor, CEO of Monster.com. Throughout the semester, some of the programs have included events promoting networking, presentation skills and legal and financing issues.

One of the Entreclub's teams is well on its way to a successful company. Estartuphelp.com has already built their site which has been designed to help those who wish to start a dot com, but do not know where to start. Anthony Asare, a UMass graduate student, has been working on the web site while Chris Brennan has been developing financials for the young company. Cassy Gardner wraps up the team, developing the marketing plans.

Many of you have heard Asare's name before. He was founder of Shopkeo.com, which lists over 10,000 companies from which shoppers may choose. With his new venture, he hopes to match the success of his first site.

Anthony Asare, Cassy Gardner and Chris Brennan compose one of Entreclub's teams, Estartuphelp.com.

The company hopes to give young student entrepreneurs the necessary resources to start their very own Internet company. The site hosts information on a multitude of subjects, including tips on starting and building a business, marketing on the internet, web design, and even how to sell your company.

Estartuphelp.com is one of many of student businesses vying for the $10,000 prize that the Entreclub is offering. Cassy Gardner, one of estartuphelp.com's founders, feels that this is because, "the economy is strong right now, it has inspired a strong entrepreneurial spirit amongst students."

At the moment, estartuphelp.com is searching for a board of directors. Citing lack of real business experience as a weakness to most young Internet startups, the founders are also looking to recruit a management team. It is the hope of the founders to grow large enough to give students across the country the resources that they need when attempting to start their own Internet companies.

The deadline for Entreclub's business plans is April 24. Until that time, we will have to wait and see if some of the companies like estartuphelp.com become the hottest initial public offerings in the months to come.

Campus Center cellar dwellers

David Katzoff

Ah, what an assignment it is to research, review and report about the very institution by which my work is reflected. Yes, as a seasoned veteran I have gotten used to – if not downright proud of – our little media hub here in the windowless dungeon of Campus Center.

Seemingly unaffected by the menacing stare of florescent lights ablaze, diligent staffers scurry around our confining district like journalistic gerbils and business savvy foxes. Only death, taxes and sunrise are viably more consistent and despite the environmental confinements, the incidental inter-squabbles and the circumstantial mishaps, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published each school day without fail, query or excuse.

"It's not just about computers, water coolers and copy machines," professes one faithful employee. "We have plenty of things to distract us here in the basement, but it is our attitudes and kinships which keeps us focused and dedicated." Right, not to mention the nerf basketball hoops, fantasy sports leagues, feverishly opinionated debating and stagnanth flirtatious air. Yet, like any democratic network run by a bunch of cynical college constituents, we preserve order and prestige while simultaneously wallkwing in tomfoolery and imprudence.

As a non-profit, student run newspaper founded on the philosophies of extolling truth, accuracy and abundant public knowledge, we are delegated within departments of individual interests and personal passions. The newsroom encompasses the field of beat reporting and editorial journalism, providing the written sustenance of the pages. Each section (Sports, News, Arts & Living, Diversity, Op Ed, Business) gravitates around bringing coverage to issues and events on-campus as well as local, national and global happenings. Since advertising revenues generate our entire source of financial income, the business office, which is broken down into various hierarchical sections (finance, distribution, advertising, marketing), is the functional force that keep us operating. The graphics department acts as the superglue that binds News and Business, creating and maintaining the visual presentation of the paper and its professional appearance. Other subdivisions like web staff, photography and delivery, are vital components to our daily efficiency.

The Collegian was originally established in 1890 as Aggie Life, which catered to the agricultural/academic community of the plow-sharing university bob. With the growth of educational disciplines, the paper transcended into the College Signal in 1901 and eventually the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. By 1967 we were rockin' and rollin' on a Daily basis, churning out the finest and freshest newsworthy material from the progressive minds of our 1960's predecessors. Through the years we have sustained our reputation as a credible, reliable source for information and an exemplars institution that fosters diversity awareness and edgy honesty.

In the realm of college-based media firms, the Collegian is one of most outstanding in its class. With an annual net worth of over $500,000, we reside at the forefront of independent economically successful R's O's.

Through it all, the Collegian's daily circulation spans far beyond the UMass and Five College populous, existing on printed plateau of journalistic fervor and stealthy integrity. Women struggle to break glass

Megan Clark

The glass ceiling still exists in the business world. For those unfamiliar with the term "glass ceiling," it means that there is an invisible barrier preventing women from advancing within a company or industry. This invisible barrier is caused by stereotypes about men and women in the business world. Because of the stereotypes about gender that the business community holds, the glass ceiling is holding women back and causing businesses to be inefficient.

Women are valuable workers as well as leaders, but as of now they are mostly recognized as workers. It is almost impossible for women to really "make it" in the business world. Women possess 50% of all bachelor's degrees and 42% of advanced degrees, however, less than 5% of upper-management and executives are women. By looking at these numbers, one cannot say that women are equal in the work force. However one could say that women are close to being equal in educational status.

The level of education a potential employee has and how well he performed in the institution is a major factor of whether or not the person is hired; however, women as, not given a fair chance in this field either. In a study done by Linda Carli and Alice Eagly, the overwhelming conclusion was that, "men preferred hiring a man or not hiring anyone at all, to hiring a woman whose performance was somewhat superior to that of the male candidate." Men are clearly the preferred choice, even when a woman's work is superior to that of a man. This is where the problem of the glass ceiling starts. Women aren't given a fair chance in the first step of getting into the business world, so it makes sense that they will continue to be discriminated against every other step of the way up the corporate ladder.

The reasons for the discrimination are varied: from women can't be effective leaders to the argument that women shouldn't be promoted because they will leave to have children.

The argument that women are ineffective leaders is something that has never been proved. The reason women are not usually leaders in companies is because they are still looked at under a stereotype. Both men and women view women as caretakers instead of leaders. It is not that women can't handle the responsibility of being leaders, it is just that they are not elected as leaders because of the stereotypes associated with women. Both men and women are guilty of looking at women as caretakers instead of leaders. When men follow this stereotype they are in effect putting the glass ceiling in place. When women believe that they and other women are not effective leaders, they are allowing the glass ceiling to be put in place and are not challenging themselves or the stereotypes that keep women from reaching the upper-management positions. Women are discriminating against their own gender.

When men and women discriminate, business is ineffective. Women possess certain skills that men do not, and they are often the better choice for leadership positions. These women are not given the responsibility because leadership roles in the past have been primarily the roles of men, and women are not even considered because they have no experience in the role of a leader.

Women will also be discriminated against because of their ability to bear children. Women have two choices in the issue of child bearing, either hope to be promoted and avoid discrimination or have children and lose hope of making it big. They are stuck between a rock and a hard place with no hope of finding an answer to the problem, because men cannot carry the responsibility that comes with carrying a child. Women who are determined to make it into those coveted upper management and executive positions will give up their desire to have children just to fulfill their desire of being a success in the business world.

The problem of gender discrimination will continue to be a problem as long as the stereotypes about men and women continue. From the first rung on the corporate ladder to the last, women need a fair chance at getting there. In a perfect world, the words glass and ceiling would never go together because stereotypes about the working abilities of men and women wouldn't exist. Men and women are equal in their capabilities of being leaders and in holding top positions in business. Once businesses start realizing this and place deserving women in the upper level positions, the stereotypes and gender discrimination will decrease and the term "glass ceiling" will cease to exist in the business world vocabulary.

Internet investing advice

By Sean Kennedy
Collegian Correspondent

So, that extra shift cleaning floors in the DC isn't helping you reach your financial goals. Let's face it, 1.5% interest from Bank Boston looks meager stacked up against 19% credit card debt. Maybe you've thought about getting involved in the stock market but don't know where to start. On-line investing is a hot topic, but can seem daunting to jump into. How do I open an account? How much money should I start with? How should I pick a broker? Is this really safe?

On-line trading firms such as E-Trade, NDB and SureTrade have sprung up in the past few years, promising quick and easy ways to invest. Aside from any illusions they might propagate of instant wealth, they have indeed delivered a level playing field for those of us without thousands of dollars in our bank accounts.

Opening an account is probably the biggest hurtle to overcome and can seem daunting when your cash is at stake. Just remember that these firms want your business, and have worked to make signing up as easy as possible. All you need, in most cases, is to provide, via secure connection of course, the same data you would when opening a local checking account. You will also be asked to print out, sign, and mail back some documents allowing trading in your name and proving you are who you say you are. After that, you will mail in a check and add funds to your account.

With as little as $250-$500 you can open an account, research, buy stock and track it daily. Trading costs for the firms mentioned range from $8-$16. Trading often can be expensive, so buying and holding a well-researched stock is the best option. Alternatively, these brokerages all offer mutual funds where professionals make the day-to-day decisions. This is ideal in that it allows diversification and management with a small trade.

When deciding which on-line broker to choose, a little homework is your best asset. Check out the home pages of the various brokers, take their tours, read what they say about themselves, and find out where you feel most comfortable. Try to find these sites in the middle of the day on a weekday to find out how well the site responds (if at all) when the whole world is placing trades. This is an excellent indicator of how well a broker has empowered his trading site, and how well your interests will be served.

The Internet can be a rather abstract venue for parking a large amount of money. Questions of safety are justified with any new technology.

In my opinion, however, the security of whichever site you choose is not going to be the issue. Although you may place trades via the Internet, your money is still with a real holding company, just as with a "brick- and mortar" brokerage. The real issue of safety is whether or not you will lose the money you've invested. Being an on-line investor myself, I can't say that you won't lose money possibly a lot of it, if things get nasty. What I especially caution is that you not invest any money that you would need in the near future (i.e. rent, tuition, food money). Investing for short periods of time is a gamble if there ever was one. Returns of 10%-20% are an average over many years and thus imply a long-term approach. Take this view and an attitude to save and invest, even while in school, and years from now you will be pleased you did.

Winners & Losers

5 Winners:

Nabisco Inc. (NGH) the people that bring us Chips Ahoy, Oreos and Lifesavers to mention a few items. This stock has seen a low of around $8 in the past year but there has been a recent spike to around $15. The company is considering a sale and other possible changes for the stockholders' benefit.

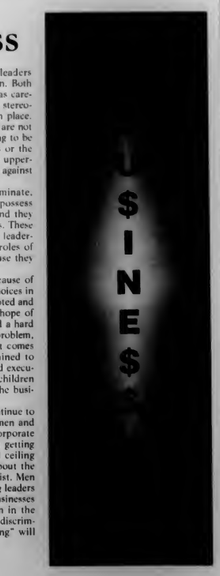
PE Corporation-Celera Genomics Group (CRA) just finished mapping and sequencing the human genome. This news brought the stock price from around $60 to what it is now, around $130.

Protein Design Labs (PDLI) just signed a contract with Merck to license some of the company's patents. This news helped boost the stock price from under $60 to over $100 this week.

QXL.com (QXLC) was given a strong buy rating by S.C. Cowen. S.C. Cowen made the new price target $333, in comparison to the recent $32. This news boosted the stock price to $54.

Krispy Kreme Doughnuts (KREM) with retail stores similar to Dunkin' Donuts had its stock IPO this week. This stock opened at $29 on Wednesday and saw a 70% stock increase.

5 Losers:



U.S. Cellular Corp. (USM) has gone from a high of over $100 at the beginning of the year to the mid fifties recently. Hopefully a change in management will help as of April 10th. 2000 John Rooney will take over as CEO. Until now, Rooney served as president of Ameritec Consumer Services.

Par Technology Corp. (PTG) took a hit with its first quarter earnings. This company is a restaurant management equipment supplier. This company's release of software for restaurant management has been delayed, which is one reason for the decline in their its price.

ArrowPoint Communications (ARPT) manages web content for Excite and affiliated web sites. ARPT gained 248.48% on its initial public offering (IPO). They saw a dip this week after the peak in price and analysts are not very optimistic about this and recent IPO's.

Visible genetics inc. (VGIN) saw a spike in its price after January to $119 and 1/8 and this week it is around $40. Visible genetics inc. manufactures automated DNA sequencing systems.

Microsoft (MSFT) has been in the news lately because of the anti-trust lawsuit with which it is faced. On Monday, U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson ruled against Microsoft accusing Microsoft of being a dangerous and aggressive monopoly.

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

Chamber Choir Hits Home

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

The University Chamber Choir will present a concert this Sunday in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall entitled "A Sense of Home." The performance will include a new work by local composer Ronald Perera and will feature the Chamber Choir, the Valley Chamber Players and boy soprano Owen Shearer. Professor E. Wayne Abercrombie, director of the program, feels the "concert touches on many meanings of home and one's country—remembering home and leaving home."

Although the program includes only three works, all by contemporary composers, there is a clear unifying factor among all of them. The Golden Door, by award winning composer and Smith Professor Ronald Perera, sets to music the anxieties and hopes of those who immigrated to the United States during the late 1800's and early 1900's. John Corigliano's musical interpretation of "Fern Hill" evokes the lush imagery of Dylan Thomas' famous poem. The piece excites the nostalgia of childhood and looks at ways in which time affects those memories. No "Man is an Island," another piece inspired by well-established literature, draws on an excerpt from John Donne's Meditation XVII and explores an individual's connection to his ancestry and humankind.

Tickets are still available for this event or can be purchased at the door. The performance begins at 4 p.m. in the Concert Hall. Call 545-2511 for more information.

The Long Road to El Dorado

By Jason M. Tennant
The Daily Athenaeum (West Virginia U.)

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. – In a heartwarming effort to crack Disney's stronghold on the full-length children's cartoon industry, Dreamworks Pictures has released The Road to El Dorado, its third cartoon. Apparently, the third time really is the charm. The Road to El Dorado is a real challenger for computerized film crown.

The film opens in the early 1500's as two con men Tulio (Kevin Kline) and Miguel (Kenneth Branagh) are trapped in the famed city of gold called El Dorado after they fixed dice to help them escape the mob they were [illegible]. In the past, find themselves [illegible] Hernando Cortez's ship [illegible] the new world. Eventually, Miguel and Tulio are discovered and [illegible] the ship. With the help of a horse named Altivo (easily a [illegible] Disney sidekick) the two escape Cortez's ship and land in the New World. There they find and follow the trail to El Dorado, where the two are received as gods. In the city, they find not only gold, but also a power struggle between the Chief (Edward James Olmos) and a priest Tzekel-Kan (Armand Assante) who both want the gods' support. Miguel and Tulio, with the help of the local thief Chel (Rosie Perez), plan to play the Chief and Tzekel-Kan against each other so they can smuggle the gold out of the city and back to Spain.

The first thing to know about the film is that the animation is excellent and makes the film bigger than life. Stunning vistas of flowers and water are shown with more beauty than could ever be seen in real life. The computer-animated sequences where Miguel, Tulio and Altivo ride waves in a rowboat that defy the laws of physics will take your breath away. The huge Rock Iguana, which menaces the city of El Dorado, is also impressive.

The film is chock full of visual and verbal jokes, which will entertain everyone. In one scene, the audience hears a steady, rhythmic beating sound, then learns it is Tulio banging his head on a wooden beam while trying to think. In another scene when the three are floating along in the ocean, a bird lands on the boat (good sign), then dies (bad sign), then is eaten by a shark (real bad sign). Other jokes and gags are more geared more toward adults. As one of the large ships is about to crush Miguel, Tulio and Altivo's rowboat, Tulio cries out, "Shi...ip!" In a scene where Miguel, Tulio and Altivo are playing the Ancient American version of basketball, the audience sees a slow motion sequence that really mocks those the slow motion pro basketball highlights.

Miguel and Tulio are fun to watch and root for. They are not really heroes—they are just con men with consciences. Their back and forth banter is amusing and sometimes clever. In particular, the scenes where the two act out a duel is hilarious. These characters could be translated to any live action film and easily be entertaining.

But it is the horse Altivo who steals the show without uttering a word. In order to escape from the cell, Miguel tries to tell the horse to bring them a crowbar. As Tulio argues that a horse could never understand to bring something like a crowbar, Altivo just tosses down the keys to the cell. In another scene after they have left El Dorado, Altivo remembers his golden horseshoes and is careful to hide them from his traveling companions.

The film does have some faults. First, the plot is just so-so. It opens well as the two con men journey to El Dorado. But once the film arrives at the city of gold, the story starts using cliches. Men mistaken for gods, the evil priest and the inevitable enlightening of Miguel and Tulio are all done in ways that have been done countless times before. Particularly annoying is the ending, which seems to go out of its way to say that greed is bad. Another minor problem with the film is the musical sequence. The songs represent a reunion for Elton John and Tim Rice, who last worked together in The Lion King. Though the songs fit with the theme and feel of the film, I felt they added little to the viewing experience. I say if you don't have any standout songs, drop the musical numbers from your films.

As has been publicized in several sources, this film has some themes that make it inappropriate for young children. Tzekel-Kan is constantly demanding that humans need to be sacrificed. There is also some slightly graphic violence during the Rock Iguaar attack (the filmmakers tried to compensate by adding a voice-over which said "I'm OK" after someone got chomped on by the giant kitty). We also see Tulio cuddling up with Chel for something a lot more intimate than a loving hug and kiss. With so many things that are more adult in theme, it would have been interesting to see what this film would have been like if it had not been trying to appeal to kids. But then again, it would have lost its best audience.

The Road to El Dorado is silly fun for everyone. Yeah, the plot is average at best and there are some other minor flaws, but the comedy more than compensates. If you aren't afraid to give into your childish side, check out The Road to El Dorado.

Eek! It's a ... Commercial

By Paul Farhi
The Washington Post

Put down the swatter. That's not a real cockroach on your TV screen. It just plays one in a revolting TV commercial that has viewers around the country hurling curses and a few other things at their sets.

The roach in question skitters across the screen in the middle of what appears to be a commercial for a fabric softener called Sierra. The bug sure looks like the real deal—like it's on your side of the TV set, not in it. Within a few seconds, however, the thing is revealed as a cleverly devised plug for Orkin, the bug-killing people.

Not soon enough, however, for the hundreds of viewers who have been shocked, fooled, amused or angered by the ad.

Darlyn Settle, a lab technician from Greensboro, Md., was so spooked she ran to a neighbor's house, awakened him and asked him to exterminate the phantom vermin. When he couldn't find anything, Settle woke another neighbor and asked her to help. That neighbor, who'd seen the ad, figured out Settle was chasing a TV image.

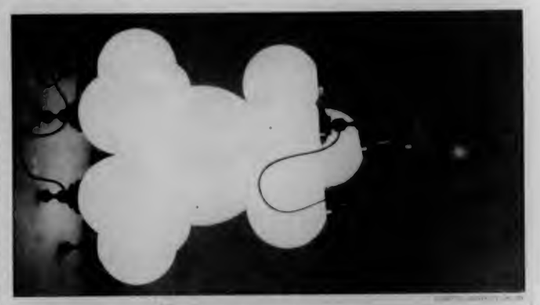
"I felt really stupid," says Settle, 30. "I think it's funny now, but in a way it's kind of cruel. What if some older person is home alone and gets scared to death?"

Lesa Epperson thought she was seeing something terrifying – a breakout by her family's new pets, a family of Madagascar hissing cockroaches, which can grow to about three inches long. The Covington, Ind., woman kept the roaches in a cage above her TV set. "I thought it was one of the babies getting loose," she says. "I panicked, because if those things get out" they can breed like, well, roaches.

Matthew Reeves of Tallahassee, Fla., told Orkin in an e-mail message that he saw the ad just as he was stepping out of the shower. He immediately whipped off his towel and began snapping it at the TV.

About 300 viewers have called or written in, some to complain that they were sickened by the sight, or that their dogs and cats have hanged at the set. So far two people have broken their TVs by throwing objects at them, including a woman who threw a motorcycle helmet, according to the company.

The bug in question is an anatomically correct, computer-generated standard American cockroach that looks actual size on a 25-inch screen. Orkin's ad agency, J. Walter Thompson, heightened the illusion by adding a slight glow around the critter as it runs across.



In a darkened living room, it may very well confuse viewers. In fact, the name of the ad is "Fake Out."

The realism is necessary to enhance what Orkin spokeswoman Martha May calls "the ick factor": "It's supposed to simulate the same feeling you get when you see a cockroach in your home. You gasp, your eyes get big, you say, 'Oh my God, a roach!'" Yeah, yeah. Don't remind us.

Icky as the spot may be, most people who've contacted the Atlanta-based company have said they enjoyed the "gotcha" aspect of the ad, says J. Walter Thompson's Mike Lollis, who dreamed up the commercial. "People enjoy a good practical joke," he notes. "Plus, we're merciful. By the end of the ad, you see the Orkin man spraying it and it falls off."

Right, but here's some bad news. Roaches usually take up residence where it's moist (such as a sink) or near food sources (such as a kitchen). But they also like to live where it's warm.

Like inside a TV set.

The Incandescent Ones (top) and Bocksay Ter (below) are just two of the pieces opening this weekend at the University Gallery in Soft White: Lighting Designs by Artists. The exhibition is running through May 19 with an opening gala this evening at 7 p.m.

Cruise Back to Risky Times

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Staff

Before he made All the Right Moves before he was asked to become one of A Few Good Men, and way before he joined the IMF team in Mission Impossible, Tom Cruise starred in Risky Business. The small film made him a giant star. To this day I don't know a single person who hasn't seen this film. The film put another one of its stars, Rebecca de Mornay, on the map as well.

Enter Joel Goodson (Cruise), an industrious and productive college-bound senior. He is responsible and has the unbelievable weight on his shoulders of being a Princeton man. His straight-arrow parents envision Joel as an Ivy League prep; Joel has other plans. Until then, he's a promising Future Enterprises. The only problem Joel Goodson has been good for was bowling.

Joel's parents go on vacation for a week and they let him have the house to himself, a epic condition; he may not permit any of his friends to come over. Joel manages to drive his father's new Porsche into Lake Michigan, and if that isn't enough, Guido the pimp is after him. While his parents are away, Joel falls head-over-heels for a twenty-something prostitute named Lana (de Mornay).

Writer/Director Paul Brickman (Men Don't Smoke) may not have done anything of note in the past decade or so, but this film is timeless, something every high school kid (and college student, to an extent) should watch, and every parent should dread. Tom Cruise proves he can carry a picture with this role. In Joel Goodson he creates a memorable character, recalling The Graduate's Ben Braddock (played by Dustin Hoffman). Rebecca de Mornay (The Hand That Rocks The Cradle) lends credibility to her role as a prostitute who falls for Joel because she sees a little of herself in him.

My favorite scenes are those with Joel and his conniving friends. Miles is my favorite of the friends; he pushes Joel to take risks and violate his parents' trust. (The actor who plays Miles can also be seen as Booger in The Revenge of the Nerds.) Another character who plays an integral role as one of Joel's friends is Bronson Pinchot's Larry Pinchot also starred in Beverly Hills Cop and the lame TV show Perfect Strangers. One of Cruise's most memorable quotes comes at the tail end of the film when Cruise is on stage as a Future Enterpriser describing his product to an audience. "My name is Joel Goodson and I deal in human fulfillment. My product grossed over five thousand dollars in one night. Tune of your life, hey kid?"

The soundtrack to Risky Business boasts the likes of the Talking Heads, Phil Collins, Jeff Beck, Bruce Springsteen and The Police. The film also did very well at the box office, bringing in around 64 million domestically. Director Brickman does a great job here surrounding Cruise with a talented cast of relative unknowns. If you haven't seen this film yet, check it out. It's all about taking chances in life.

How can you not want to take home Tom Cruise this weekend?

Minutewomen bounce biteless Brown

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

When your neighbors invited you over to play in their pool as a child, it was a true pleasure. You threw on your obnoxious lame shorts, took a long drink of Ecto Cooler and strapped on your inflatable arm "muscles." And once you hit the water, you showed your appreciation by being nice, not peeing in the pool and playing well with all the other kids.

But then you grew up.

No. 11 Massachusetts (22-6) treated its aquatic hosts with anything but kindness in Providence on Wednesday night, racking up six unanswered first-half goals en route to an 11-2 victory over Brown. The Minutewomen ran their records in Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) play to a perfect 10-0 with the win, their sixth of the year in as many tries against the Bears.

"We try to take games like this as hard practices," senior All-American Marci Hupp said. "Things like defense are things that we can always work on and get better at."

The defense couldn't have gotten much better against Brown, a team that has probably seen enough of the Maroon and White to last the rest of the season (six of the Bears' eight losses have come at the hands of the UMass).

Sophomore goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich piled up a stellar 12 saves over the course of the game, and Brown didn't manage a goal until the third quarter at the Smith Swim Center.

"Defense is definitely our key right now," senior All-American Katie Grogan said. "If we don't let teams score three goals, we're probably going to win."

Brown's ineptitude on the offensive end wasn't the only thing keeping the Bears off the scoreboard. UMass approached this game with much cooler heads than in the teams' previous matchups, thanks in no small part to the return of Head Coach Dan McOsker. The skipper had been forced to put water polo on the back burner until his wife gave birth, and the arrival of Jacob Scott McOsker at 11:50 p.m. on Tuesday allowed the coach to be back at poolside for the opening swim-off Wednesday.

"Our assistants, Vince and Donna, have made a huge step up as far as knowing us all as players," senior Laurie Edwards said. "But obviously, having your head coach there makes a big difference."

That difference came, according to Edwards, in the form of better concentration and execution for the Maroon and White.

"This was a very different game than the last time we played Brown," Edwards said. "We went in and took things slowly, thinking about every move we were making. Our concentration was just much more visible."

It would seem that after beating the Bears in five previous meetings this year, the Minutewomen would have little to play for in Providence. But in the words of co-captain Grogan, the team needs to take advantage of its chances to fine tune its style before the games really start to count.

"We just know that we don't have many big games left before Easterns, so we're running out of game situations where we can work on different things," Grogan said.

At this rate, the team won't need much tuning up at all to repeat as Eastern Champions. With the defense shutting down any semblance of resistance and the scoring at an all-season high, there doesn't seem to be much that this team needs work on.

Except for maybe its pool visiting etiquette.

In comparison, UMass returns the nation's top netminder of 1999 in Jen Nardi. The junior goaltender, along with three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young, serves as the heart of one of the most respected defenses in the country – ranked sixth nationally last year. The unit will set out to contain a Bonnie attack that averages a not-so-eye-popping 3.75 goals a game over a relatively unimpressive schedule that includes Howard, Wagner, Canisius and Ohio. Wagner blanked Bona, 16-0.

Jen Nardi

The Minutewomen, who have experienced hills and valleys offensively, only cracking the scoreboard three times against Syracuse but peaking at 17 against Vermont, could kick-start their A-10 run with an explosion.

Seniors Rebecca Minaker and Stephanie Pavlick lead the proverbial charge for the UMass scoring group, with 12 and nine points, respectively. Juniors Fay Naber and Rachel Ingraffea back them up with eight and seven.

Straight up scoring and defense is a small part of Barnes' season-opening picture. The strategy is based more on effort.

"The strategy is to be one of the hardest working teams in New England, if we can practice hard day in and day out, that will prepare us for everything," Barnes said.

The Minutewomen finally busted open the game in the fifth inning by scoring four runs and increasing their lead to 6-0. Scofield drove in the first run of the inning with a single to center, and Perey drove in two more runs a couple of batter later with a single to right. She then came around to score after stealing second, on a Robustelli single.

In the sixth, UMass added its seventh and final run when Holtz scored on a passed ball.

Holtz had two hits, a run and an RBI on the game, and also picked up the win on the mound for the Minutewomen, going all seven innings and striking out 10. She also gave up four hits and walked five. The win improved her record to 7-5 on the season, and she is showing no signs of slowing down after winning the UMass/WHMP athlete of the week award for picking up two wins last weekend against the Princeton Tigers and the Syracuse Orangemen.

This weekend the Maroon and White will have much tougher competition than the 3-21 Central Connecticut Blue Devils when they travel down to Blacksburg, VA for a doubleheader against Virginia Tech. Last year UMass played the Hokies in the Atlantic 10 championship game, and once again UMass is a tough conference opponent.

As usual, Hadley and the pitching staff will be ready to meet the challenge.

"The pitching staff has to be ready to pitch at any moment because we don't have a true rotation," said Hadley, "and usually we do a good job of that."

Men's track takes it to N.E.

By Adam De Young
Collegian Correspondent

What do you do when win a championship? You defend it. That is just what the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team is trying to do this season as the defending New England Outdoor Champions.

With the season opener behind them, the Minutemen must turn their attention to each individual meet and continue to build on a strong opening weekend. Their attention now focuses on this weekend's five-team competition at the University of Connecticut, beginning at 11:00 a.m. UMass will be facing four other strong teams in UConn, Boston College, Central Connecticut State and Rhode Island.

UMass is hurt by the loss of key runners who graduated last season and will look to their young guns to pick up the slack. The loss of sprinters Tom Toye and Neil Concepcion, who combined to hold four school records in sprinting and relay events, will leave room for sophomore Adrian Zullo and junior Marc Sylvander to make their marks.

The biggest void left from last year's graduating senior class is the loss of five of the top jumping performers. The Minutemen will look to Paul Berberian and Andre Roach in the triple jump, and sophomore Alex Maravel-Piccolo and junior Dave Greco in the long jump to make things happen.

UMass continues to be strong in mid-distance and distance running led by junior Brendan Sullivan who was the runner-up in the 5,000 meters at the Atlantic 10 Indoor Championships last season. Last week, the Big Apple native reeled in second in the steeplechase at the Princeton Invitational.

The Minutemen also return senior Kevin Somers, who placed seventh in the 3,000 meters last season at the Atlantic 10 Championships. Both seniors Matt Ely and Sean Murphy are among UMass' top indoor runners in the 800 and 1,000 meters, both placing in the 1,500 meters at the Atlantic 10 Championships last season.

In the throwing events the Minutemen remain strong this season returning All-American Vic Morency, as well as juniors Jesse Austin and Chad Schwarz, who will throw the javelin this season for UMass. Hammer throw record holder, B.J. Cardoza, will be replaced by sophomores Steve Anderson and Jeff Tully.

Morency is UMass' first ever track & field All-American, and wasted little time in showing that off, qualifying for the NCAA Championships in the javelin. Morency's throw of 225' 1 1/2" was four feet short of his personal best, and the school record of 229' 7," which he set last season. His performance was good enough for first place. Morency also placed third in the discus with a throw of 170' 9 3/4."

Other standout performances for the Minutemen were turned in by freshman Stefan Russ, who finished second in the high jump, soaring through the air to reach a height of 6' 5." Senior Ben Baraldi placed fifth in the 400-meter and turned a performance good enough for third place in the 110-meter high hurdles, with a time of 14.4 seconds.

sophomore Steve Prisco takes his place on the thinking bench. However, Prisco will be competing in doubles play today.

Junior Bill Greener, one of the motivational forces on the team will also add his own personal punch to the roster. "I'm getting the chance to play Bill Greener again, which always makes me feel good because he really lends such a spark to the team," Dixon said.

The Fordham Rams are vulnerable right now, and ripe for the pounding. The Rams were recently defeated by U.R.I., which was in turn convincingly defeated by the Minutemen. Therefore, it goes without saying that UMass is strongly favored in today's matchup. However, considering the off again-on again spring season the Maroon and White have experienced, a win against the injured Fordham squad is not written in stone, just very likely.

"Fordham is one of those teams that we should put aside," Dixon said. "They're coming here. Winning one match is nice, winning two matches means that you've got some momentum working, so two is always better than one."

The Maroon and White will be playing on the Upper Boyden courts at 1 p.m. today. A win today would prepare the Minutemen for a more challenging St. John's team, which they'll encounter on Monday.

Seniors say goodbye in style in rout of Fairfield

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Smiles come a lot easier when the wins come in.

Yesterday at the Upper Boyden Courts, the Massachusetts women's tennis team did the easy-to-see thing, pouncing on the Stags of Fairfield by way of a 6-0 thrashing.

The victory snapped a four-game skid that gnawed on the squad's morale, but UMass (5-13, 2-8 spring season) was due for a scintillating performance. In addition, the Minutewomen sent their seniors out on top at home, crushing their neighbors with ease.

No. 1 Ola Gerasimova got the show on the road despite battling a case of tendonitis in her right arm. She easily rolled over Lenka Hurton in straight sets, 6-2, 6-4, which, frighteningly enough, was the closest the visitors from Connecticut would get. Gerasimova was forced to retire in the second set against Seton Hall's Pilie Anike on Wednesday, but fought through for an impressive win at the top spot.

Annie Hamilton won at the three spot, pounding Elizabeth Steege, 6-0, 6-4, this after picking up the Minutewomen's only win in their 5-1 loss to the Hall. Hamilton has now taken three in a row for UMass and leads the squad in singles victories this season. She and Gerasimova are tied for doubles victories as a pair, but they wouldn't need to unite, as the Minutewomen had already defended their home turf.

Helena Horak took care of business as the second seed, drubbing Fordham's Kelly DiMario, 6-1, 6-1.

"I think this was a very emotional match," head coach Judy Dixon said. "And I think Helena Horak said it best: 'It's nice to come out and win big like this.'"

After taking her singles and doubles matches against Temple, Robyn Lebovitz fell miserably earlier this week, 6-1, 6-2. But the team captain bounced back with a vengeance, hammering her competitor at the four spot, 6-0, 6-0.

Michelle Kuhr wasn't as successful, but somehow that doesn't seem harmful to the squad. Kuhr yielded just a single game to Alyssa Haddad, blasting her was to a 6-0, 6-1 win, marking the clinching fifth victory to allow freshman Katie Stammen to sit the afternoon out.

"We have a lot of people who are injured or sick, but they came out and played for our seniors," Dixon said. "I didn't have to do any coaching today. They just came out and played hard."

The Minutewomen take the courts once against on Monday against Fordham, which will start a three-match, three-day stretch.

Michelle Kuhr and the women's tennis squad took on Fairfield yesterday at the Upper Boyden Courts, setting the stage for three matches in as many days early next week.

Water polo ready for 'Cat fight in NYC

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

As the adage goes, no rest for the wicked. Or the wicked good, for that matter.

The No. 11 Massachusetts water polo team will look to continue its absolute domination of the Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) by stomping into the Big Apple Saturday night and hitting the waves against the Wildcats of Villanova.

Massachusetts (22-6, 10-0 CWPA) is 6-0 all time versus the Wildcats, including an 8-6 squeaker on April 1 at the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championships in Princeton. Despite the team's record of success in games with Nova, the players view this game much like Wednesday's war with Brown, as a measure of the team's readiness for postseason play.

"Just like the Brown game, this is a situation where concentrating on the little things will make a big difference," senior Laurie Edwards said.

The Maroon and White put on quite a displas of the finer points of the sport in its 11-2 bushing of the Bears, going beyond just solid team play and scoring goals to focus on precision perimeter play and ultra-clean individual defense. Those are the exact keys to success in the Eastern Tournament, according to Edwards.

"We did a great job against Brown of keeping our hands up, not fouling on the perimeter and having good position in the hole set that allowed for a crash to come back," Edwards said. "There were getting ejections, and we weren't."

While the Bears were busy getting booted, UMass went to work putting repeated dents in the Brown net. Six different Minutewomen scored in the romp, something that Edwards views as crucial to putting the 'Cats away early on Saturday.

"When we played Villanova last weekend, we didn't shoot real well," Edwards said. "This time around we need to have the confidence to shoot this goalie and shoot her hard."

That will probably spell a very long night for Nova keeper Amanda Sewald, especially considering the devastating accuracy with which UMass has shot the ball lately in the Maroon and White's last nine games, the team's top four scorers have totaled a staggering 33 goals.

The Minutemen were outhustled by Penn State in last week's 11-8 loss. They hope to amend their ways tomorrow when they battle Maryland-Baltimore County at Garber Field.

Men's lacrosse challenges UMBC

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will try not to dwell on the past, but sooner or later, its history of a sluggish offensive attack could sink the Minutemen.

Tomorrow at Garber Field, the Retrievers of Maryland-Baltimore County (3-5, 2-2 Eastern College Athletic Conference) roam into Amherst to test the merit of their conference cohorts, in turn finding a place for themselves. Both squads are on the same playing field, the winner moving up a level while the loser will be left with a tremendous uphill battle.

That hill would be especially difficult for the Minutemen, whose schedule tightens over the next month. UMass comes off a disappointing 11-8 loss against Penn State, one that momentarily silenced the Maroon and White after a three-game run.

"It was disappointing," head coach Greg Cannella said. "That one is one we would like to have back. It puts us in a situation where our guys have to come out ready to play."

Cannella watched his squad sputter for the game's opening 30 minutes while the Nittany Lions took advantage in the second quarter and beyond, scoring five consecutive goals to bury the Minutemen.

UMass hopes to have better luck against UMBC, who comes in off a heartbreaking 8-7 loss to Bucknell, where the Bison scored with 4.5 seconds left to come away victorious on Wednesday afternoon. Head coach Don Zimmerman had seen it before, as his UMBC squad fell to No. 6 Georgetown, 11-10, in mid-March.

UMBC's less than spectacular record shouldn't hold much weight, as the Minutemen might've fallen for that trick against sub- 500 Penn State last week. But UMass returns home after living away from home for two weeks. Three of the Minutemen's four wins last season came at home, and they look to return to the win column for a vicious stretch run.

"They're a sneaky team," Cannella said. "Guys that are seniors and juniors on the team have been to the playoffs for the last two years. They know how to win the big games when they need to. They're going to come in ready to play."

Much like last year's loss to Butler, a tough loss to a close competitor could do the Minutemen, knowing that the nation's finest lurk only a week away, beginning with next Saturday's brawl with Loyola. But many would agree that what lies ahead should be limited to the Retrievers, who will look to not only help their own cause, but to all but knock UMass out of contention in the conference.

"We're not looking ahead," Cannella said. "We can't afford to."

UMass' offense has received a spark of sorts from junior John Madigan, who has found the back of the net eight times in the past three games, including a pair in the loss to Penn State. He and senior Rich Kunkel have carried much of the scoring load. The latter has a team-high 15 goals, including a six-goal eruption against Boston College, while Madigan's used a mid-season surge to push his total up to 12.

Marc Morley has provided a tremendous complement to the aforementioned scoring duo, compiling seven goals and eight assists. He has been the catalyst on offense, setting the stage for Kunkel and Madigan on many occasions.

The Retrievers will counter with Jeff Radcliffe, who tallied five goals in the Georgetown loss. He headlines the offense along with Dan Marohl, who hands out two assists on average. But, like the Minutemen, UMBC has strained in finding the scoring column, so goals should come at a premium.

"It's a game that we need coming off a loss," Cannella said. "We want to get back and prove to everyone and to ourselves that we can win the big game."

The ball drops at 1 p.m. tomorrow at Garber Field.

Hadley throws no-hitter UMass crushes CCSU

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Jen Hadley has just done what most pitchers can only dream of. She has thrown a no-hitter.

Yesterday in New Britain, CT, Hadley shut down Central Connecticut State in the second game of the doubleheader by going the distance, striking out a career high nine, and leading UMass to a 9-0 win. It was the first no-hitter of her career, and it would have been the first perfect game of her career had she not issued a pair of walks to Central Connecticut leftfielder Kerry Harrelle.

"I had good stuff and overall it was a good outing," said Hadley.

In the first game of the doubleheader the Minutewomen won by a score of 7-0, but it was not enough to satisfy Head Coach Elaine Sortino, who said that the team needed to play 10 times better in order to be ready for the Atlantic 10 opener this weekend against Virginia Tech.

"After the first game coach got on us a little bit, so we knew exactly what we had to do for the second game," said Hadley.

The speech must have worked, because UMass came out for the second game of the doubleheader and played its best softball of the season.

Ashley Bakken started things off in the top of the first by taking one for the team. She advanced to second on a Teri Rooney single, and took third after a perfectly executed double steal. First baseman Brandi Cross plated both runners with a single to right center and the score was 2-0 before Central Connecticut had even recorded an out. Later on in the inning, Emily Robustelli singled home Cross for another UMass run, and after a Kiley Scofield walk, Debbie Tomoguchi hit an RBI single to left field. After half an inning of play the score was already 4-0.

In the fourth inning the Minutewomen would tack on three more runs. This time Cross hit a double to left center, and advanced to third on a double to center by Designated Hitter Kaila Holtz. The next hitter was Cherra Wheeler who showed why she is potentially the best all around player on the team by bunting Cross home and Holtz to third. Holtz came around to score on Robustelli's single, and Tomoguchi picked up her second RBI single of the game two batters latter. By the end of the fourth the score was 7-0, and by game's end, the Maroon and White had put a very solid nine runs and 17 hits on the scoreboard.

"The hitting really came through today," said Hadley.

Hadley also came through for the team, pitching the best game the Minutwomen have seen since the likes of Danielle Henderson. She improved to 3-4 on the year with the win.

UMass took a longer time getting started with the bats in the first game of the doubleheader, but still managed to score a solo run in the second inning when 4'11" speedster Anna Percy collected an RBI groundout, and a solo run in the third inning when Cross came around to score on a Holtz single.

Hokie shmokie: UMass out to pound VTech

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

It's been three years since the Massachusetts baseball team has beaten Virginia Tech.

Then say "so what." What's happened in the past between these two teams doesn't matter.

UMass is ready for war. The Maroon and White have already forgotten about last year's 9-4 loss to the Hokies. "We're just talking that loss," catcher Chris Morgan said. "We're going to go out and try to get three wins this weekend. That's about it."

Yes, the Minutemen have put together an up and down season. And yes, they've gone a mere 3-00 in their last six games. But, throughout the spring term, UMass has hinted towards the assemblage of a breakthrough year.

Coming off of a 10-2 dismantling of Central Connecticut and the emergence of solid bats from Morgan, Mike Kulak and Kevin O'Connell, it seems all the Minutemen need to do is piece things together.

"We're just going to play our ball," Coach Mike Stone said. "Pitching, hitting, and defense...it doesn't really matter what else you do. If you do those three things, well then you have the chance to win."

This weekend, when the Hokies waltz into Amherst for a three-game conference matchup, they do so with confidence. Coming off of six straight wins, V-Tech (19-12-2) will look to overpower the Minutemen (11-9) as they field four players hitting over .300. Chris Hutchinson, who leads Tech with a .370 batting average and has hit six home runs this year, will be just one of the opposing sluggers eyeing the baseballs being thrown from the mound of Earl Lorden Field.

"It should be a good series," Stone said. "The two best teams in the league are ready to go after each other."

Probable game one starter Travis Veracka will attempt to close down the Hokie offense in an effort to lower his current 3.86 E.R.A. So far this season, Veracka has started five games for the Minutemen, going the distance twice for both of his victories. Facing national powerhouse Florida in his first appearance of the season, Veracka threw six strong frames, allowing just one run only to pick up a no-decision with the effort.

A similar performance for Veracka on Saturday would do wonders for the Minutemen as they take a stab at the Best Team in the Atlantic 10 crown. Craig Szado will start the second game and Jesse Santos will follow in the Sunday finale.

At the plate, Morgan, Kulak and O'Connell join Aaron Senez and Shaun Skeffington in the clubhouse, all batting above the .300 mark. As of late, Morgan has been far from bad. Two days ago against Central Connecticut, Morgan ripped his third home run of the year to help the Minutemen stride to a 10-2 win. The UMass catcher finished the game with two hits, two runs and three RBI. In the Minutemen's three game series with Dayton last week, Morgan went 6-for-13 while driving in three runs. In the second game, he went 4-for-5 while driving in two.

"Our confidence level is pretty good, we've been playing well," Morgan said. "We had a good practice [yesterday], we'll be fine."

UMass and VTech begin the weekend on Saturday with a doubleheader. The first seven-inning game will start at noon with the second slated to start at 2 p.m. The first pitch on Sunday will be thrown at noon.

Mike Kulak is hitting a cool .352 this season, good for third on the team. His Minutemen play three with A-10 champion Virginia Tech this weekend.

Streak? Men's tennis squad hopes so

By Farrah Alexander
Collegian Staff

There are lots of opportunities, and where there are none, you can create them. Such is the position that the Massachusetts men's tennis team finds itself in. Today the Minutemen will have the chance to seize their second win of the week and tip the scale in their direction as they go head to head against the Fordham Rams.

The gods were definitely smiling down on the Minutemen this past Wednesday when they guided them down the path to a vital victory against the Hartford Hawks.

The win was precisely what the doctor had ordered for the Minutemen, who were on the hunt for a remedy for their ailing confidence. Luckily they received a soothing dose of the confidence booster. A win today as well, would set them in the right direction again, after a suh-par start to their spring season.

Today's matches will offer opportunities on a personal level for the players as well. Senior Bo Navarro, who has been denied the option to complete several of his matches due to his opponents defaulting, may finally get a favorable nod today when he competes in the number two spot for his team. Navarro will not only be playing a large role in the singles spot but his strengths will be heavily relied on in doubles play as well.

"[Bo] is probably the purest doubles player that we have on the team," Head Coach Judy Dixon said, "and probably one of the best doubles players that we have on the team.

"He's got wonderful hands, he's got a good feel for the ball, a very good touch, very quick hands around the net, and also he's very smart. He's very adaptable, he can do different things on the court, so if plan "A" isn't working he can go to plan "B", because he has a lot of different things he can do with the tennis ball. He knows how to change spins; and he knows how to change pace.

"He usually plays better against people who hit the ball harder. He doesn't play as well against people who hit the ball back as often, but when he plays higher up in the line-up he's going to be seeing someone who hits the ball harder. And he's got the desire to win as a senior now; he's in this place where he just does not want to let go of his last few matches."

While Navarro is slated to play in the number two spot, Dixon's other players are being shuffled too. While Will Shaw was missing from the lineup on Wednesday, in effect to allow him to contemplate intensifying his game, he will be present in today's lineup, while

Bona ppetit: UMass opens A-10s

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After fighting through a seven-game season-opening stretch that boasted three ranked teams, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will take its show on the road to begin the Atlantic 10 schedule. The conference slate kicks off today at St. Bonaventure in Olean, N.Y., and continues on Sunday when the Minutewomen travel to Pittsburgh, PA to duke it out with Duquesne.

"Strength of schedule is definitely important," Massachusetts coach Phil Barnes said. "It's about who's beating who. [Our schedule] is strong, and its getting stronger next year. 'Any team any time any place,' to steal a quote from coach Calipari."

In the A-10's second year of lacrosse, UMass will serve as the host of the championship tournament on May 6th and 7th, but in order to have the opportunity to do more than just serve their guests tea, the Minutewomen will need to place among the top four teams in the league. To grab such a distinction, the Maroon and White will have to make good on exhausting road trips such as the one this weekend.

Last year Massachusetts recorded an impressive 4-1 conference mark, good for second in the regular season, but this year things are different.

While St. Bonaventure is new to the Atlantic 10, and could offer the Minutewomen some surprises on the field, Duquesne enters the A-10 schedule as a pick by some to challenge for the title. Despite taking home only the fourth spot in the 1999 tournament, the Dukes return all 12 of the starters that registered an 11-6 overall record last year, including the seventh-ranked returning scorer in the nation in Meghan Hungate. The junior midfielder comes into the 2000 league schedule with 1999 A-10 season and tournament All-Conference designations, as well as Second Team Regional All-American status.

Hungate will be aided by five teammates who hit the enemy net at least 23 times apiece last season, as well. The experienced group has tallied a 3-1 record over their first four games, though the only noteworthy opponent, Ohio State, pummeled the Dukes by a 19-3 margin.

The weekend opener against the Bonnies might prove to be an uncomfortably sharp decline in competition for UMass, however. St. Bonaventure is experiencing its first campaign in the sport this season, and is led by an unproven cast of freshmen and club players from the previous year.

The player touted as the centerpiece of the team coming into the season, freshman blue-chip goalie Katy Jensen, has yet to hold an opponent to less than 12 goals over an 0-4 season beginning.

Raccoon causes local outage

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A raccoon is responsible for the power outage that occurred Saturday morning at approximately 3:15 a.m., leading to two fires, two arrests, an assault and numerous accounts of property damage in the Southwest residential area.

The raccoon caused the regional power outage when it entered into a Western Massachusetts Electric Company (WMECO) electrical substation and came into direct contact with the power equipment, according to WMECO spokesperson Denise Vogel.

"A raccoon got into podick substation at 3:15 a.m. on Saturday," Vogel said. "It's one of our substations where our power is brought down to a level where it can be brought across distribution lines. Chances are [the raccoon] was electrocuted."

According to Vogel, more than 7700 customers in the towns of Amherst, Deerfield, Hadley, Hatfield, Montague, Leverett, Shutesbury, Sunderland and Whately were affected by the power outage. Power was restored to all customers by 5:03 a.m.

According to Barbara Pitoniak, director of the UMass News Office, power was lost to campus around 3:18 a.m. and wasn't restored until approximately 4:29 a.m. She stated that the Southwest residential area was the most affected during this period of time.

"The entire campus was affected, but most of the incidents were at Southwest," Pitoniak said. "There was a large disturbance outside the area of Southwest. Apparently there were incidents of bottles being thrown [from] windows and people being hit."

Pitoniak said there was an additional report of a male being assaulted outside the John Quincy Adams residence hall, though no injuries were reported.

Two arrests were made by the UMPD, one of which was in connection with a fire involving an alleged arson. The first incident involved a UMass Security desk that was taken from the Coolidge residence hall and lit on fire in the middle of the Southwest quadrangle.

John M. Moran, 20, of 363 Gray St., Arlington, was arrested at approximately 4:04 a.m. in connection with starting the fire and was cited for additional charges.

"He is charged with disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and burning a personal property over $25 dollars," Pitoniak stated.

Jared Thor Brunn, 21, of 29 Paul Revere Rd., Acton, was arrested at approximately 4:21 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct and pending additional charges.

A second fire started in a seventh floor dormitory room inside the Washington residence hall at approximately 4:42 a.m. According to Pitoniak, the fire was caused by a student placing a shirt over a lamp during the power outage. When the power was restored, the lamp caused the shirt to catch fire.

An additional ten UMPD officers were called in "to augment the on-duty force," Pitoniak stated. Also responding to the scene were the Hadley Police Department, Massachusetts State Police and the Amherst Fire Department.

While the fire department fought the blaze, additional instances of vandalism occurred, including reports of vehicles in the vicinity of the fire having their windows smashed with objects.

According to Pitoniak, Chancellor David K. Scott was around the Southwest area during the time of the outage and was concerned by the actions of students who had participated in the "unruly behavior."

"This kind of behavior is deplorable and incompatible with the University's excellent academics, excellent faculty, and top-notch students," Scott said in a statement. "We will not tolerate such behavior and we will see that all appropriate disciplinary steps are taken."

A UMass Resident Assistant, who wishes to remain anonymous, said the fire was contained to a single room in Washington. The fire triggered the water sprinklers, causing some damage to the lounge furniture in the room. He stated that he didn't know the extent of damage in the room due to the fire, but that the water caused the carpeting to become soaked.

Elena Panesis, a sophomore communications major, was witness to the incident. According to her, there was chaos throughout Southwest before the fire in Washington occurred.

"Before the actual fire, there was a tower war and it was crazy," Panesis said. "All the [residents of the] towers were screaming at each other. They [students] had a bonfire with the security desk and were throwing and adding things to it."

She said the fire alarm went off around 4:45 a.m., causing residents to evacuate the building. She said the fire department wouldn't allow students back into the building until around 7 a.m.

According to her, the fire was caused by a halogen lamp that was open on the top, causing the article of clothing hanging from it to catch fire.

Heather Kines, residence director of Washington residence hall, declined to comment.

Amherst Fire Department Captain Timothy Masloski said the number of fires caused by halogen lamps is small, and that most occur when students use them to dry their clothing.

"It's [an] extremely dangerous thing to do," Masloski said. "The temperature of those bulbs comes up to 500 degrees Fahrenheit. That's obviously hot enough to burn any kind of cloth or clothing. A person touching it will get burns."

Masloski helps conduct a program called SAFE (Student Awareness Fire Education) for fourth graders that teaches them how to prevent fires.

"It's amazing that you have 18 to 22 year-olds who can't realize that this is a fire hazard," Masloski said. "Even fourth graders in our program can identify it the minute they see it as a hazard."

The Southwest residential area, along with parts of Amherst, Hadley, Sunderland and other local towns, was without electrical power Sunday morning.

Spike Lee lectures at Amherst College

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Spike Lee capped Amherst College's weekend symposium on "Black Representation in the Media" Saturday night with his keynote address that was not limited by the title of the event. Using an intimate narrative style similar to many of his films, Lee covered topics ranging from standardized testing to cultural imperialism. Like many youths, Lee admitted being oblivious to the shaping of cultural messages by mainstream media. Recalling his first experiences of media, Lee said, "Growing up in Brooklyn, New York, I had no idea people made movies."

Lee went on to recall a time when Sidney Poitier was the only major African American film star, when "Julia" starring Diane Carroll was the only TV program with an African American actress, and when Michael Schultz was the only African American director in Hollywood. This was the environment under which Lee entered Morehouse College in Atlanta, Georgia.

The summer of 1977 was what ultimately gave Lee his motivation to become a filmmaker. This was the summer of disco and, of course, the Summer of Sam, on which Lee's most recent film was based. Lee said his photographs of the explosive New York summer inspired him to major in mass communications, and eventually to attend film school.

Since Lee did not score high enough on his GREs to attend either UCLA or USC film school, he was relegated to NYU. On NYU, Lee commented, "At least some people had the vision to see that standardized testing... should not be the only way."

Lee discussed some of the problems he encountered at NYU, including being viewed as someone to fulfill a quota. He also talked about The Answer, his first film-school project for which NYU tried to dismiss him. Needless to say, the film, about a young black screenwriter assigned to remake the classic Birth of a Nation, did not jive with the school's decidedly old-school media values.

Lee said, "If you're ignorant enough to think Birth of a Nation is the best film ever, there has to be some sort of asterisk for the way that it portrays African Americans."

Lee, who had already been hired as a TA, was allowed to complete his remaining two years at NYU. From then on, he was determined to make films about the African American experience. Lee said that he understood 100 percent where African Americans had been and how they had been portrayed in the media. Seemingly, his goal as a filmmaker was to rectify the situation; however, this was not easy.

Lee told the story of how She's Gotta Have It, his breakthrough masterpiece, won him the equivalent of a "student Oscar," got him lots of publicity, and even helped him find an agent, but did not guarantee his success.

"There is no such thing as overnight success," Lee proclaimed. He then added, "To make it in this country, you [African Americans] don't just have to be as good as your white counterpart, you have to be ten times better."

While he was waiting around for George Lucas and Steven Spielberg to call him, he realized that no movie was going to fall into his lap. Lee said that this was when he decided to go the independent route or as he put it, "to get into Hollywood through the back door."

She's Gotta Have It, budgeted on only $575,000, went on to gross $8.5 million domestically and that did finally get Hollywood's attention. Even the film's success however, did not guarantee easy going for Lee, as he was continually forced to respond to criticisms of his films. For instance Lee said that he often has to deal with people who feel that some of his characters are derogatory representations of African Americans.

Lee explained that since there are so few African American representations in the media, the ones that are put forth are seen as representing a lot of people.

"That's the burden African

AC student to study Brazilian community

By Joseph Collins
Collegian Correspondent

Sociology major Michael J. Ward, an Amherst College senior from Wayland, MA will experience what it is like to spend a year alone in a foreign country starting mid-August. Awarded a grant of $22,000 from the Thomas J. Watson Foundation, he will be traveling to Curitaba, Brazil to study how that city has used public policy to improve life for its residents. His research aims at exploring the possibility of a modern-day utopia.

Mrs. Thomas J. Watson, Sr., founded the Thomas J. Watson Foundation in 1961 in honor of her late husband, the founder of IBM. In 1968 it was decided that the Foundation should use the fellowship program to constitute a major portion of its mission in improving students involvement and knowledge of education and world affairs. Since then over 2,000 students have been awarded grants totaling approximately $23,137,000.

Michael Ward says of his choice to travel to Curitaba, "I've never done much traveling. I wanted to get an experience that was different. Towards the end of the summer, I saw a Dateline report on Curitaba."

From there he began to research the city and its successful bus system, parking system, and other social programs designed to improve the city's outlining shantytowns. "I was interested in a city that could do so well on so little money. With this fellowship, it's the perfect project. I've never been to South America. This is the perfect way to do it."

Since he was a child, Ward had been interested in the idea of a utopia. Thus, this trip seemed a perfect match for him.

Mr. Ward is also interested in Curitaba because city workers there are excited for their city; they want to improve it. He feels that this fact opposes the way most Americans perceive city workers and politicians. He wants to see what the civil servants are doing right and what they are doing wrong. "I want a knowledge of what they're doing right and how they've gone about implementing policies - a grasp on what is going on there."

He states that a big part of this trip will be personal growth and putting himself up to challenges. "It's about doing whatever you need to get by, taking risks, doing things you couldn't do in other contexts."

Once in Curitaba, he cannot return to the United States for one year with the exception of an extreme emergency. Even though his family plans on visiting him down there he says that, "I am nervous. I was in Italy for two weeks in high school with 27 other high school students and two teachers that I knew. Curitaba is a city of two million people. I have to find an apartment, make connections, and deal with people. It will be different in Brazil than in a classroom. [Being nervous is] good and [it's] healthy, if I wasn't nervous I'd be lying to myself or [it would show that] I didn't need to go anyplace."

In his proposal for the fellowship, he discussed his childhood fascination about the idea of a utopia and whether or not it is possible to make a perfect community. He realizes that Curitaba will have poverty, crime, and plenty of things about it that are not perfect. However he believes the city does a great job for its two million citizens and with a very low budget. "I'm aware there is no perfect place. I'm looking for places that have done better. Wherever I end up living, whatever I end up doing, I want to see what [others] are doing right and [I want to] transplant it."

He is disappointed at the "...almost universal American belief that everything done in government could be done better in the private sector."

Michael Ward hopes to somehow change this with his future work. His interests include journalism, education, and public policy.

American artists have to deal with," he said. But, Lee warned that just because a director includes a character in a film, that character does not represent the director's viewpoint of all African Americans. Lee said that just because Wesley Snipes' character snorts cocaine in Jungle Fever does not mean that he endorses drug use or that he thinks all African Americans do drugs.

During his speech, Lee stressed the importance of images in all forms of media. He believes the imperialistic power of images in TV, film, and music videos not nuclear weapons – make America the most powerful country in the world.

As for the future, Lee encouraged students to do what they love to do and not succumb to peer pressure. He said of his NYU classmates (who had become either accountants or lawyers) that most were now "fat and unhappy." "And that's a bad combination," Lee added.

Lee concluded his speech somewhat controversially, dismissing the progress of African American media representations.

"I'm a lot of ways, I don't think we've progressed that much," Lee said. Commenting on the low-costs and easy accessibility of new digital video cameras, Lee added, "I think the thing what might save us all is technology."

About this trip he states that, "It'll be a challenge, something to push me to new experiences, new things to step out of the culture I grew up in. Being from Wayland, coming to Amherst I haven't been able to see how the world functions. This will be a glimpse at seeing [the] different ways [that the] world functions."

Ideally Mr. Ward would like to write a book about his experiences in Curitaba. However he is not sure how feasible that would be. The trip will nonetheless be a dream come true, a chance to study a city with great public policy. Ward says that Curitaba has, "found innovative solutions to problems of mass transit, traffic, hunger, the spread of disease in the slums, flood damage, as well as such seemingly trivial problems as the high cost of park management." It is these things that he wishes to focus on. Still he realizes the gift in personal growth in addition to educational growth that this fellowship grant and future experience in Curitaba offer him.

Michael Ward is currently preparing to be a member of Amherst's graduating class of 2000 and looks forward to a summer of studying Brazilian Portuguese in Boston. Presently he has no knowledge of the language. Excited about his forthcoming trip he states, "Whatever I end up doing, this will be an amazing thing."

Murray State investigates fire

By Morgan Hardy & Lisa Wheat
Murray State News (Murray State U.)

MURRAY, Ky. – Four separate investigations are being conducted on a massive fire Wednesday that resulted in the destruction of two units in Murray Place Apartments.

The State Fire Marshal's office, Place Collegiate Properties, the Murray Fire Department and the Kentucky State Police all are scouring the site for evidence pointing to a possible cause.

"What is realistic is that we had a severe wind blowing and a spark came from somewhere," Murray Fire Department Chief Pat Scott said Thursday. "Where it came from is what we have to figure out."

Twenty-five mph winds fueled the fires that consumed two apartment buildings and damaged another Wednesday afternoon. No one was injured in the blaze.

Training Foreman Kevin Hedrick said the fire started about 4:30 p.m. in an apartment building in the southwest corner of the uncompleted complex, located on Towe's Drive off North 16th Street. Murray Place Apartments are owned by the Atlanta-based Place Collegiate Properties.

"The guys came running out of the building screaming my name," Hedrick said. "The winds blew the flames and caught the other building on fire and then back into the pine trees. I didn't hesitate in calling the fire department."

Murray Assistant Fire Chief Jim Shropshire said the fire department arrived at the scene by 4:45 p.m., nine minutes after it was notified about the fire at 4:36. The firefighters found one flame-engulfed apartment building that was beyond saving.

Hedrick said the first building took fewer than 10 minutes to burn to the ground.

"It was a huge ball of flame," Hedrick said.

For about 10 minutes, only three firefighters with one hose battled to keep the flames contained to the second building, two-thirds of which had already been destroyed. While that building was pronounced a total loss, firefighters successfully stopped the flames from spreading to other complexes.

Before the fire, 10 to 15 workers were completing framework and hanging sheetrock inside. Hedrick said the units were "almost structurally complete" before the fire began, with electrical and plumbing work finished on both buildings.

Place Properties Site Development Coordinator Mel White could not put a price tag on the damages.

Several construction workers were in the buildings when the flames erupted.

"I looked back and (the first building) had flames coming out of the side," construction worker Meely Parker said. "I turned and ran."

A third building's exterior was scorched from the heat off the first building's flames. Place Properties Site Leasing Coordinator Barbie Snyder said damage was limited to window warping and minor plywood damage.

High southerly winds carried fire-laden debris to an area near the apartment complex and additional trucks with water pumps were sent to attempt stopping the fire from spreading into a wooded area.

"We had to send additional pumpers to that area to extinguish the wooded area and keep it from spreading to the duplexes," Shropshire said.

Several acres of woods were burned.

Residents from University Heights, a series of duplexes behind the development, extinguished several of the field fires while the fire department continued to fight the main fire.

One fire set a small trailer belonging to Dale Campbell, owner of University Heights, ablaze. The fire was quelled by the Murras Fire Department, but not before making the trailer a total loss.

Hispanic community debates heated Elian controversy

By Philip P. Pan and Michael Fletcher
Washington Post

WASHINGTON - The midday crowd had just begun arriving at the Arte Latino Beauty Salon on Sunday when the casual conversation among the hairdressers and their clients turned, as it has so often these past weeks, to little Elian Gonzales.

"He should go back to Cuba with his father," said stylist Maria Sarabia, 59, who was born in Bolivia.

"No, he should stay! His mother died for him to be here. She made the ultimate sacrifice!" cried a co-worker, Janira Soriano, 24, a Salvadoran immigrant.

Customer Orlando Conde, 49, interrupted: "The boy should be with his father. Family is more important than anything."

"It's like this all the time," said Eva Hernandez, 31, the salon's owner. She believes Elian should remain here because "this is a free country with opportunity for us all. If I died, I'd want my children to be raised here too."

In the barrios of Washington and other cities across the country, Latinos are following the saga of Elian Gonzales like a real-life soap opera, one full of political intrigue and family strife. They know all the characters - the father Juan Miguel, the uncle Lazaro, Cuban dictator Fidel Castro looming in the background - and they understand the plot all too well, particularly how immigration can separate parent from child.

But the non-Cuban Hispanics are much more divided, and much less passionate, about the issue, than are Cuban Americans, most of whom are adamant that the 6-year-old should remain here rather than return to Cuba with his father.

Among Hernandez's clients, for example, opinion has been running only slightly in favor of allowing Elian to stay. And although tempers flare occasionally, Hernandez said the level of emotion doesn't approach that among Cubans, either in the United States or Cuba.

The plight of the 6-year-old boy rescued from the sea on Thanksgiving Day has dominated the front pages of Spanish newspapers in the United States for weeks, as well as Spanish Internet sites and newscasts on Univision and Telemundo. But except for Cuban Americans it has not sparked significant Latino political action.

"There's a lot more Latino interest in this story than Anglo interest, because Latinos can relate to the immigrant experience, the possibility of losing a parent, of a kid being left alone," said Fernando Guerra, director of the Center for the Study of Los Angeles at Loyola Marymount University. "But it's like a telenovela or soap opera. They're following it as a human drama rather than a political drama. The interest hasn't translated into strong political views."

Guerra said that explains why most Hispanic political leaders have remained on the sidelines. "The attitude is, 'If it were up to me, send the kid home. But why alienate other members of the Hispanic coalition over an issue my constituents don't really care that much about?'"

Neither the National Council of La Raza nor the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF), two of the nation's most prominent Hispanic advocacy groups, has taken a stand on the Elian affair. Nor has the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. Many Latino officials have avoided questions on the subject.

An exception has been Rep. Jose E. Serrano, D-N.Y. After Vice President Al Gore broke with the White House and endorsed a bill to grant residency to Elian and his Cuban family, Serrano let loose on national television with a remarkable attack, saying Gore had infuriated Hispanic voters.

"I'm very bitter and angry about this," he said. "If he wants to pick up support from the Latino community, the proper way to do it is to talk about the family value of reuniting this father with his son.... Last year, (the government) threw out 150,000 people from Mexico, the Dominican Republic, Columbia, Africa, and not one of those people got a special bill."

Hispanics beyond Miami are more likely to believe Elian should be returned to his father according to interviews with community leaders and others. But few expect their elected representatives to pick a fight with the Cuban American leaders who have been allies on other issues.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Tex., whose district includes El Paso and is nearly 80 percent Hispanic, said his constituents "just aren't focused on this issue."

"This is not an all-consuming issue in the Latino community at large," said Reyes, who favors returning Elian to his father. "This is only all-consuming in the Cuban Latino community."

Raul Yzaguirre, president of La Raza, said many Latinos feel Elian should be returned to his father, but his organization has chosen to remain silent. "Cuban Americans have been traumatized by Fidel Castro in ways that most of us don't understand," he said. "Even though we think they are wrong on this...we are reluctant to alienate those who feel so strongly."

There has long been an undercurrent of tension between Cubans and other Latino groups, partly because Cubans are more conservative and Republican than other Latinos and partly because U.S. immigration policies have favored Cubans, because they are refugees from a Communist regime. Cubans who reach U.S. soil are generally granted residency, while other immigrants who arrive illegally face deportation.

Cubans comprise only about 5 percent of the nation's 31 million Hispanics, but higher citizenship and voter registration rates - as well as their heavy concentration in Miami - have earned them political power beyond their numbers.

The continuing commotion over Elian has highlighted this disparity. Yzaguirre said many Latinos are upset that thousands of children in circumstances like Elian's, many of them from Mexico or Central America, never get any attention. Instead, they are quietly detained or returned home.

Washington attorney Jose Petierra, host of a national call-in show on immigration law on Spanish-language radio, said his Central American clients are "bemused" by the Elian case but also worried it will distract Congress from acting on immigration bills that would help them and their families.

Our Opinion
Energy Efficiency

While gas prices have begun to drop and will probably continue to drop until summer, lowered gas prices may actually do America a disservice. Most Americans are now aware that car emissions lower air quality, especially in many urban areas, causing potential health and environmental problems. But as long as gas is relatively cheap, Americans will continue to use their cars instead of walking, riding a bike, or taking public transportation. Furthermore, not only do Americans depend almost completely on their cars, they are also enamored with gas guzzling cars like sport utility vehicles that are not environmentally friendly.

America has a terrible track record of developing alternative sources of power and bringing these ideas to the market place. Without a crisis to set events in motion, no one will spend the time and energy to develop either alternatives to petroleum or more efficient ways of using petroleum.

The technology to make cars that run completely without gas is probably a long way off. Either they cannot travel long distances, or they cannot sustain high speeds, or they are too expensive. Thus the solution to the environmental and therefore the health problems caused by many of today's cars may be alleviated by using technology both to make cars more fuel efficient and to reduce car emissions. Some small steps have been made in recent years towards this goal, and the current high gas prices may make consumers ready to consider alternatives.

For example, several companies have developed hybrid gas and electric cars that get about 80 miles to the gallon. One of these, the new Toyota Prius, reduces emissions by about 90%. Since its release in Japan a few years ago, many people have purchased this car, and there are about 30,000 of them on the road in Japan right now. Hopefully they will catch on in the U.S. within the next couple of years.

These cars are only a small step in the right direction, and successful sales in the U.S. would encourage other companies to carry out this sort of research and market these cars heavily in urban areas. But people would probably be more likely to purchase this kind of car if gas prices remained high both now and in the coming years, even though this is not likely to happen. The public has been very vocal about the high gas prices over the last few months, and it is an election year.

High prices are also good at least in the short term for the countries that produce the oil. Oil revenues keep the economies of several Middle Eastern countries going, and strong economies often keep these countries from political instability, instability which the U.S. does not want to see happen there.

Energy efficiency has been increasing in the U.S. and other Western countries in the past decade. Thus petroleum consumption has decreased, and new technology has exposed hundreds of billions of barrels of oil still lying within the earth. Thus a scarcity of oil is not imminent, but that does not mean that we should consume it all because it is there. Instead, we should continue to improve efficiency and develop technologies that decrease emissions because of the environmental and health related consequences of high levels of petroleum-based emissions. However, the Collegian believes that people will not be conscious of their gas consumption unless prices remain high.

No easy fix for schools

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. – Texas Governor George W. Bush and Vice President Al Gore have been squabbling over their respective education plans. You probably don't know about this, since only a few hospital receptionists in Cedar Rapids have been paying attention to the seemingly interminable Road to the White House. But as I'm sure Estelle in intensive care could tell you, America's mediocre education system will be safe with either of the current candidates. Al and George have pledged to do absolutely some of what is in their power to ensure that a little bit of money is being spent to maybe make our schools better.

They remind me of blowfish, which inflate their bodies in an attempt to frighten their enemies. Both men believe their proposals will rescue little Johnny from illiteracy, joblessness and head lice. Bush will do this by, among other things, making kids take more standardized tests. Gore wants all four year-olds to go to pre-school. And both pledge that their changes will turn schools around in a few short years.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York often derides the efforts of politicians who want to make education look like an easy win situation. Of President George Bush's (the elder) 10-year-old education goals, Moynihan scoffed and remarked that they were "lofty, immeasurable ... and the product of a leakage of reality that was stupefying then as now. First and foremost that by the year 2000, U.S. students would be first in the world in math and science achievement. Stating that our goal was to (quickly) become the leader in math and science was folly."

That "leakage of reality" is responsible for the peculiar American delusion that a few programs are going to change the dismal conditions of our schools, especially the ones in rural and inner-city communities. The American addiction to painlessness has given us several generations unwilling to do anything that requires an ounce of sacrifice. But excellence is not cheap. The education changes that we must undertake will be painful. To give ourselves the schools we deserve, I believe we must resign ourselves to at least three fundamental upheavals:

Did George Washington ask if it would be too expensive to fight for America's independence? Did Harriet Tubman question the practicality of returning again and again to rescue more slaves?

Duncan Teater

1). Schools must be smaller: No high school should number more than 500 hundred students. We ought to limit middle schools to 300 and elementary schools to a maximum of 200 kids. Students aren't sheep. They shouldn't run in herds. And who needs ID badges when the principal knows every kid by name?

2). Classes must be smaller: No high school class should contain more than 20 students. A third-grade class of 15 ought to be considered almost too big.

3). Teachers should have a starting salary of at least $50,000. After a few years of successful practice, they should be paid $65,000 - $70,000 a year. Salary sends a message about appreciation, and we're sending the wrong message to teachers. They are just as valuable to society as doctors, lawyers and certainly ballplayers. Let's reward them in kind.

These dream conditions are just that: the basic conditions needed for real learning to begin. After that, politicians can't regulate a perfect education. They can only provide schools and classrooms that aren't zoos and teachers who are paid an attractive wage.

Such ideas are a poisoned political package. They would cost billions – perhaps trillions of dollars! They would call for a national sales tax, or a cut in defense spending or some other sacrilege.

They are expensive and impractical. Were I to propose this to someone on Capitol Hill, he or she would surely tell me that there just aren't the resources to accomplish such lofty goals. My response? When has anything great ever been practical?

Did George Washington ask if it would be too expensive to fight for America's independence? Did Harriet Tubman question the practicality of returning again and again to rescue more slaves? Was Franklin Roosevelt all that concerned that there wouldn't be the resources to defend the entire world against Adolf Hitler's terror?

Of the latter example, my grandmother remembers World War II with mixed emotions. While she feared for the life of her soldier husband, she reflects fondly on the incredible spirit generated by Americans who were sacrificing their trivial concerns and banding together to face a common threat. Everyone was caught up in the common good, and it was a remarkably fine feeling.

That same spirit is demanding a rebirth. Today's common threat is a population grossly unprepared to face their civic responsibilities and their lives. The 21st century is going to require more than a fourth grade reading level, and yet that is a legacy of our schools. If we value our freedom, and we understand that it takes an educated public to protect that freedom, we must see fit to sacrifice some of our wealth so that American schools live up to the promises of America.

We know that smaller schools, smaller classes and better-paid teachers are big parts of the answer. We claim to want to do something about the education problem. What is stopping us, beyond our own selfishness? The sacrifice involved in implementing such fundamental upheavals will not only help build better schools; it will help build a stronger, nobler American community.

Are you listening, fellas? George? Al?

Missing: one lost voice

I've been silenced! Apparently one of my loyal readers was really upset about something I wrote and decided that he or she would stop at nothing to keep me from speaking my mind. That reader's name is Biology. Yes, that's right, for the first time in my life I've lost my voice. Maybe I really angered Biology when I made fun of the Hooter's girls. Maybe it was really angered after my little recycling tirade. However, whatever the case may be, Biology has fought back. I can no longer speak.

Ryan Benharris

It started as a simple cold, and progressed from there. About two nights ago, I realized that my nose was stuffy and my throat hurt. I had a little bit of difficulty sleeping, and by Thursday morning I thought I was about to die. I still managed to get myself out of bed and go to class. During the course of the day I felt much better, but I slowly noticed that my voice was becoming much more hoarse and it was a lot more difficult to speak. Around six o'clock it was very noticeable that my voice was deteriorating. Stupidly, I played volleyball and increased my chances of getting pneumonia. By the end of the night I was completely gone.

Okay, so now that I've made you happy by giving you the details of my illness, it's time to analyze. Apparently losing your voice has some serious perks. I was hanging out with my friend Elena, and she thought that the sound was the greatest thing ever. Apparently it increased how "cute" I was, because I sounded like a five year old. "You should pick up the phone and call that girl right now!" Elena proclaimed. "I'm telling you, there's no way any girl would ever reject a guy that sounded like that. It's way too cute." Yes, losing my voice made me cuter, so I guess that's a good thing.

Another advantage to losing my voice was the horrible night that I suffered through last Thursday. Yes, advantage and horrible don't sound like two words that should be used in the same sentence, but I feel truly fortunate that I had an awful fever and was unable to sleep. You see, Housing Service Cable Network was showing Wild Wild West at 4:00 a.m. Had I not been sick with no voice, I wouldn't have been able to re-evaluate my previous decision that Wild Wild West is one of the worst movies ever made. Now I'm 100% sure that it is the worst movie ever made.

After I finished watching Will Smith say things such as "I just made that up" after hitting a guy made out of steel with a shovel, I decided that I just couldn't give up on the enlightenment that television was bringing me. I changed the channel to TBS, and watched, "America's Funniest People." It's that spin off show of "America's Funniest Home Videos" hosted by Dave Coulier. The series showcases people with some wonderful talents that include a guy who makes his arm look like it's broken, and a man who does an imitation of "Ruger Rabbit in a blender." Apparently at some point ABC decided that just watching people get hit in the nuts with a football wasn't enough – they needed to show people who should get hit in the nuts with a football because they're annoying!

After "America's Funniest People," I remembered how entertaining infomercials are. I watched this half-hour-long commercial for the "Space Saver." It's literally a plastic glad bag that you put your clothes in, and wrap them up so they fit neatly into a suitcase. One woman proclaimed it as "An invention that saved her life." I needed my life saved, so I called the toll-free 800 number. I had to call quickly though, because if I was one of the first fifty callers, I'd receive a free pair of plastic gloves to seal the bag with. Sadly, the operator couldn't understand what I was saying because I had no voice and she said to me, "Listen buddy, you need stop stalking us or we're calling the cops." I began to wonder how deranged you need to be in order to watch the space saver people. Then I gave up on it.

I ended my terrific night by throwing in my copy of Lethal Weapon 4. I spent the first half of the movie contemplating why I own the fourth installment, when the other three are so far superior, but again, I gave up on it. Finally at around 5:30 a.m. I fell asleep. When I woke up this morning my voice had died to something less than a whisper. However, everyone seems to think it's hilarious, and I'd be lying if I said that I didn't think I sound ridiculous as well. Some things just need to be taken with a grain of salt I guess.

Oh yeah, and if you happen to see my lost voice, it goes by the name of "loudmouth," but don't be afraid. It's probably more scared of you than you are of it.

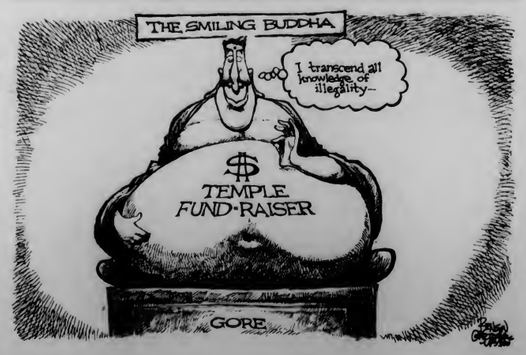
The PVTA: ride it!

We have all heard the ever-popular nickname of "Zoo Mass" for our beloved University of Massachusetts campus. Where does this name come from? A recent poll of UMass students by SARIS (Student Affairs Research, Information, and Systems) tells us that between dorms and off-campus parties, frat parties, and bar outings, 78.5% of UMass students have been intoxicated within the last month. Not only that, but 53.2% say that they have been a passenger in a vehicle driven by someone who had been drinking, and 27.2% admit to driving after drinking too much themselves. Think about four of your friends. Has someone who was drunk driven any of them home? Have they driven drunk? Now think about yourself. Have you? As you can see, this is clearly a problem.

Mary Barba

Four of my classmates and I are participating in a community health project, in which the goals are to identify student issues and concerns that affect the Amherst community. In the process, we discovered this problem of alcohol abuse and drunk driving that plagues the UMass campus. The highest percentages of drunk driving are found within the junior and senior class levels, as reported by SARIS. We recognize that this is probably due to the fact that many, if not most, of these students live off campus and are of age to patronize the bars. A great portion of the problem, then, lies around the bars and downtown life, and we want to do something about it!

To combat the issue, we have written a formal proposal and sent it to administrative heads in all different departments and organizations around campus. Our goal is to work with the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority and extend their bus hours another forty-five minutes, from 12:30 a.m. to 1:15a.m., on weekend all nights and Thursday. Allowing students, both off and on campus, the responsible option of taking the bus, rather than driving their cars, is a great idea. In fact, the extended bus schedule would not only benefit the students of UMass, but it would positively affect the community as a whole. Extending the bus hours would provide many students with the confidence of a safe and lawful ride home.



Our group has begun devising various advertising campaigns for this potential endeavor, including fliers informing students of possible changes and what these changes would do for them. We have also come up with the slogan "Ride It," which we plan to use as our catch phrase to grab students' attention. Speaking with various managers of the bars in downtown Amherst, it has become evident that people in the community are concerned, and we have received positive reinforcement from them. Mike McLaughlin, owner and manager of McMurphy's Downtown Tavern, agreed that "drunk driving is a huge problem in our society," and that something should be done about it, supporting our campaign. Student Trustee Seth Avakian exclaimed "I support your initiative entirely," but pointed out that this campaign has been attempted in the past and was struck down every time.

From the beginning the PVTA has been there to help the students of the five-college area and looked out for their best interests. Taking this step toward safer streets and helping in a preventive manner against drunk driving appears to be as beneficial to the students and community of Amherst as it is for the PVTA and UMass administration.

What can we do to make it happen? We, as a united and strong student body, must be pro-active! We must show the bigwigs that we want to live in a safer, more aware environment and that it is their responsibility to help us make it one. Show your support by writing to or emailing the SGA. Make yourself heard!

Tommy Lee Jones explains to a shaken Samuel Jackson that he did Double Jeopardy "for the money."

Rules questions moral lessons

Rules of Engagement
Directed by William Friedkin with Tommy Lee Jones, Samuel L. Jackson
Playing at AMC Mountain Farms, Hadley

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

"It's not murder, it's combat."

Many would argue that war is no place for morality – the business of war by its very nature demands that we act with a certain mindless automation, doing what needs to be done and trusting in those of higher rank than ourselves to issue the appropriate commands. Ideally, battles should take place in a completely anonymous landscape in which good and evil are easily defined, and the loss of actual human life is obscured by layers of euphemistic terminology; this ideal, however, is thwarted by the inescapable fact that every soldier is a thinking, reasoning human being whose reaction to the horrifying reality of war will be an individual and morally informed one. Removal of the human element from warfare is an impossible dream.

What happens, then, when events that transpire during the heat of battle come under examination during peacetime, by civilians who have no understanding of the pressures of a combat situation? All context is lost, and judgments are cast in an artificial arena of social thought in which war is held to exist in harmony with the romantic notion of a soldier's code of honor. The moral system at work during combat is replaced by a different, inappropriate moral system imposed by ignorant civilians and legislators who care nothing for the individual soldier, and the result, a clashing of ethical worlds, can become a breeding ground for hatred and resentment.

Rules of Engagement tackles this conflict head-on, presenting aging soldier and Vietnam veteran Colonel Terry L. Childers (Samuel L. Jackson) as a man dominated by military life and completely unprepared for the reactions of the civilian world. He has no wife, no children, and no existence outside of the Marine Corps. The government sends Childers on a mission to secure and possibly evacuate the United States embassy in Yemen, which has come under siege by an angry crowd of protestors. As Childers and his team touch down via helicopter, snipers have begun shooting at the embassy building, and ambassador Mourain (Ben Kingsley) is in fear of his life. As the team tries to evacuate Mourain and his family, they come under increasingly heavy fire from both snipers positioned in buildings, and armed civilians in the crowd below. After taking several casualties, Childers orders his men to open fire on the crowd.

In the aftermath of the episode, however, no evidence can be found to support Childers's claim that the protestors were armed, and he is court marshaled for, among other things, over 80 counts of murder. Childers chooses as his defense attorney fellow marine Hayes Hodges (Tommy Lee Jones); the two men served together in Vietnam, and Childers once saved Hodges's life through the morally reprehensible act of shooting an unarmed radio operator.

Is the act of killing an unarmed man truly reprehensible, however, if it saves the life of a comrade? And is giving an order which will lead to civilian deaths justifiable if it brings an end to conflict? These questions, which have been at the heart of United States military ethics since the dropping of the two atomic bombs during World War II, form the intellectual backbone of Rules of Engagement, and although the first half of the movie flounders a bit, the second half brings sufficient closure to the matter.

The general narrative of the story, however, plays out like many other such military courtroom dramas, most notably A Few Good Men, and the writing is noticeably weak in places. The cast, including L.A. Confidential's Guy Pearce, manages to gloss over the script's many blemishes with powerful acting, and William Friedkin's directing is urgent and compelling (although he seems a little too fond of the extreme close-up).

Superficially, Rules of Engagement too much resembles its contemporaries: beneath of the surface, however, lies an intelligent discussion of the how inappropriate it can be to hold a person's wartime actions to the standards of peacetime civilian politics. B+

Hamlet's soul finds a new machine

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Correspondent

Hamletmachine is not a conventional night of theater. And despite what its name would suggest, it is not an adaptation of Hamlet. Originally, Heiner Muller's 1977 piece was a response to Shakespeare's play in the context of Nazism, Communism and his feelings concerning Germany. This production, directed by Tanya Kane-Parry, is a response to Muller's play. It is a sensory onslaught, examining sexuality, human power struggles, and a questioning of gender roles and gender relations.

Muller's play is now a part of New York City's Fringe Festival, a venue now famous for their countless selections of avant-garde, experimental, and often controversial plays and performance pieces. This particular adaptation takes the same nonconformist approach, from the acting to the set and costumes.

It is utterly unorthodox; there is no traditional Aristotelian plot structure, no real characters, and no one clear message. Indeed, the play's messages are many and paradoxical. It uses conventional standards of male and female and at the same time defies our expectations of gender. Instead of typical lead and supporting characters, the entire company takes part in the series of unclearly delineated vignettes concerning the main themes of the piece. In an audience favorite, four actors donned a sort of gas can phallus and grinded to Bel Biv Devoe's hit Poison (yes, that's right, Poison). Another scene depicted almost iconic worship of a young female's body, and through the temporary white fabric, set and men in white and gas masks, represented an intense need to surround these females with a sterile virginity. There is tension surrounding interactions between the men and the women in this play, as they fail to connect with each other emotionally when sex does not succeed. Sexuality itself is a source of tension and conflict, especially between the tortured figures meant to represent Ophelia and Hamlet. There are scenes of sex between mother and son, a Freudian reading of Hamlet's (or the Hamlet figure's) Oedipal complex.

Even the set is a paradox, with the look of chaotic industrialism, dominated by metal bars set up at varied and sharp angles. The bars serve as a sort of prison, adding to Kane-Parry's commentary on the restriction of personal expression and power struggles. The costumes too are restricting, using items like dish racks, plastic tubing, and ropes to tie limbs and block the face from the audience. Everything about the physical elements of the show restricts the audience from recognizing the human element in the actors and the play. Kane-Parry and the technical directors execute the themes of the play masterfully through the design and look of the show.

The audience is not told what to do with the confrontation of the sights and sounds. This is not a condescending night of theatre. We are to glean the messages or insights without the help of the playwright or director, and it is left up to us to decide what do to (if anything) with the examination of society we have just witnessed. Hamletmachine is often shocking, but always entertaining, and if we are attune to the messages, we will leave with a better understanding of ourselves and the world around us.

Korn and Staind address Issues at Centrum

KoRn/Staind
Worcester Centrum
March 30, 2000

By Stefan Von Imhof
Collegian Staff

After being frisked for weapons, cameras, and lasers at the security gate, I felt a surge of energy as I stepped into the Worcester Centrum last Thursday night. There was an intense aura all about the arena, as thousands upon thousands of fans were piling onto the floor and into their seats for what was sure to be a killer show: the rock gods Korn, along with Staind and the wacky world of "Spike and Mike's Twisted Animation."

The "Sick and Twisted Tour" is Korn's biggest, loudest, longest, and most expensive to date. It started in Lakeland, Florida on February 16, and covers roughly 30 cities over nine weeks. This is an amazing feat for a band that, three years ago, had little more to their name than two albums, a few radio-ignored singles, and a dedicated fan base. Now, with their latest release, the triple-platinum Issues, having debuted at No. 1 on Billboard's "Top 200 Albums" chart, Korn is ready to show the world that they are, in fact, the leaders of the new metal revolution.

Before any of the bands got on stage, amidst the tension and anticipation, a fan about 20 feet behind me yelled, "Can you feel the anger in this place?!" I remember thinking to myself, "he couldn't have put it any better!" Staind finally came on, and put on an intense, extremely powerful show. Playing such songs as "Crawl," and "Just Go" from their new CD, Dysfunction, Staind showed that they truly are one of the best new live metal bands around. The highlight of the set came when their lead singer, Aaron, appeared on a platform in the middle of the crowd, to sing the band's hit single "Mudshovel." Overall, Staind proved to be an excellent opener.

After some more Spike and Mike Animation (which is simply too sick and twisted to explain here), followed by approximately 20 or so minutes of boob flashing by some girls (and guys) on the floor, the lights went out, and the five-member band from Bakersfield, California, stormed onto the stage. They didn't waste any time at all, opening with their first single from Issues, "Falling Away From Me," followed by the first track from Follow the Leader, "It's On!" The explosion of noise ripped throughout the Centrum, in what was one truly powerful combination of opening songs. At this point, there wasn't a soul in the crowd who wasn't entirely overcome with the intense energy and anger radiating from the stage. The band then broke into the driving, almost techno beat-oriented, "Got the Life." Watching lead singer Jonathan Davis up there on the lighted stage, singing his heart out, and hearing 30,000 fans sing along below him, I realized that now (as opposed to four years ago, when I first became a fan), Korn is definitely living "the life," so to speak.

About twenty more minutes of Korn's signature low-end, ultra heavy sound ensued, comprised mostly of songs from their first three albums. A surprise came when Korn suddenly disappeared from the stage only to have the members of Staind appear in their place! Korn themselves then came up from below the floor on the other side of the arena, and watched as the members of Staind covered the song "Need To" from Korn's self-titled debut album.

When Korn came back to the stage, Jonathan Davis had his famous bagpipes in his hands. Every true fan in the house knew that this could mean only one thing. Sure enough, as the platform Davis was standing on was being raised 50 feet in the air, he began to play his minute-long bagpipe solo before his band mates joined in, in a song called "Chutes and Ladders." A few more songs from Issues followed and then Korn played the opening notes to "Kill You." The insanely intense final track from Life is Peachy.

When "Kill You" ended, Korn left the stage to thunderous cheering and shouting. Everyone knew they would return for an encore, but what would they play? Well, after about 5 minutes of "We want Korn!" chanting, the band returned to the stage to play the most powerful song of the night. After a slight intro, drummer Dave Silveria broke into the first track from their first album, "Blind," the song that started it all. This was the perfect way to end their set, and the fans showed it, with an even more deafening applause, before they left the arena.

Guild's funny Noises

Noises Off
Student Union Ballroom
April 7

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

The UMass Theatre Guild closed their season this weekend with one of the funniest plays ever written, Michael Frayn's Noises Off. This was undoubtedly the Guild's best work all year as they perfectly executed complex timing, relentless fast-paced action—all presented in an original, and new for the Guild, way.

Noises Off follows a troupe of actors who are having some difficulty putting on the play Nothing On because of the sordid love triangles within the group. The result is a hysterical, near-constant exchange between the characters in the play within the play and the actors playing those characters.

And the Guild did a fine job balancing the two, finally not relying on tongue-in-cheek slapstick, but instead on rich, real humor found within a script. Brian Girard and Melissa Spinks led the cast in absolutely paramount performances as Gary/Roger and Ms. Clakett/Dotty, respectively. Their comedic grace was abundantly clear throughout the show and both, particularly Spinks, illustrated a real sense of acting, too. Todd Hanaburg as Lloyd, the director of the play within the play was consistently wonderful, as was Trisha Gransewicz as Brooke/Vicki, Pedro Gomes portrayed an absolutely charming Selsdon, the alcoholic cast member constantly in search of a bottle.

Although they were, for the most part, just as strong as the others, there were moments when Rob Killeen as Fredrick/Philip and Bethany Fournier as Flavia/Belinda seemed to lag behind the rest of the supreme cast. This may be at the fault of the scriptwriter, though, for not giving them ample material. With regret, John Kazlauskas as Tim had only a limited amount of stage time and never got the chance to demonstrate his obvious talent. The same goes for Jana Jacobsen as Poppy, who by the third act was quite clearly capable.

Tim Calderwood's direction has to be commended, because without a strong artistic design, it's unlikely that a show so physically challenging could be orchestrated with such ease. Technically, Noises Off was seamless, too, with an impressive rotating set design by Kristy Baltezore, excellent costumes by Casey Williams, and overall tech direction by Stepanie Yellin.

The Guild deserves praise for nominating an appropriate and brilliant play to end the year with, and for delivering it with the natural grace of a student group striving for professionalism.

AIR
The Virgin Suicides Original Motion Picture Score
Astralwerks

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

The electronic music exhibited on these two releases isn't the BPM-happy dancefloor rug-cutters that are enjoying popularity as of late thanks to Fatboy Slim and, in another class altogether, Eiffel 65. Rather, it's the dark and gloomy sounds that lurk in the head of that guy that just walked by with the black trenchcoat, knee-high boots, and more than a hint of eyeliner on a warm summer day. These are the depressing anthems that Nine Inch Nails and Underworld have managed to turn into success stories.

Both the debut album from the creative Hednoize and the most recent delivery from one of France's finest exports Air are more likely to inspire tears than eyerations, but they are both fine works and strangely beautiful in their own unique ways.

The strength of Hednoize stems from the eerily captivating voice of vocalist Free, who pulls the listener in like a magnet with his melodic whisper. He doesn't go out of his way to please, and (thankfully) never lets his vocals be distorted like so many other electronica vocalists, instead offering the perfect competition to the sparse generated sounds that swirl around him. In fact, the Milwaukee duo, completed by electronica veteran Daniel Lenz, went out of their way to make sure all of the sounds on their debut release Searching for the End were computer generated, shunning even the simple sounds that could be attained manually for their digitized counterparts.

The result is not only an interesting trip down memory lane to a time when artists like Depeche Mode drove their electronic sound with strong vocals and songwriting, but a highly enjoyable first step forward in reintroducing this potentially fruitful genre. On the opening cut "Loaded Gun," Free sings "I am a gun and I am loaded," and he proceeds to fire away for the subsequent ten tracks. The personal "Woven" is the perfect marriage of words and music, and "Devil's Train" has a fun atmosphere that proves that they don't have to be all doom and gloom. However, there are snags along the way, such as the generic drug-addiction song "Drain" and the fairly mundane "My Machine." But when the peaceful closing sounds of "The Road" invite a look back on the path traveled, it proves a captivating and memorable experience.

Instead of building up to a possible masterpiece like Hednoize, Parisian duo Air is coming off one, their critically worshipped 1998 debut Moon Safari. Unfortunately, the pressures of following up such a work as well as being associated with such a controversial film have created an air (ha!) of hype that is almost unmatchable even for these brilliant minds.

However, an admirable attempt is made. The atmosphere surrounding The Virgin Suicides is high expectations from the debut film of director Sophia Coppola, daughter of formerly cool Francis Ford and wife of currently cool Spike Jonze. The title promises both sex and violence and the film already reportedly had to be edited due to sexual content. Where Air comes in is to give us what the mood of the film will most likely be, and their gloomy score suggests some seriously weird stuff.

If you have had the pleasure to witness the cute video for "Playground Love," the first single from the soundtrack, on the notoriously crappy College Television Network, its somber feel should give you a good idea of what to expect. The slow and easy pace filled with soulful bass and the vocals of Gordon Tracks creates less of a relaxed feel than one of impending doom or just plain depression. That mood is certainly the prevading one; witness the resonant effects over the low and deep loop on "Dark Messages" or the haunting ambience of the appropriately titled "Ghost Song."

Things aren't always this pass-the-tissues happy, though, as Air do know how to pick up the tempo and throw out some wildly creative sounds. Live drumming provides a good backbone to the moderately danceable "Dead Bodies" as well as "Dirty Trip," and the explosion of sounds that occurs after the unnecessary spoken word of "The Word 'Hurricane'" is awe-inspiring. But like so many of the ideas on this album, it's too short and not fully expanded upon, like the potential that lies in tracks such as "Clouds Up" and "Bathroom Girl," both of which clock in at somewhere under three minutes.

The saving grace for both albums, however, is the undeniable air (again!) of pop sensibility that runs through all of the tracks. It's good to hear that even though machines run the show here, the presence of a good melody is still the driving force. Both: B+

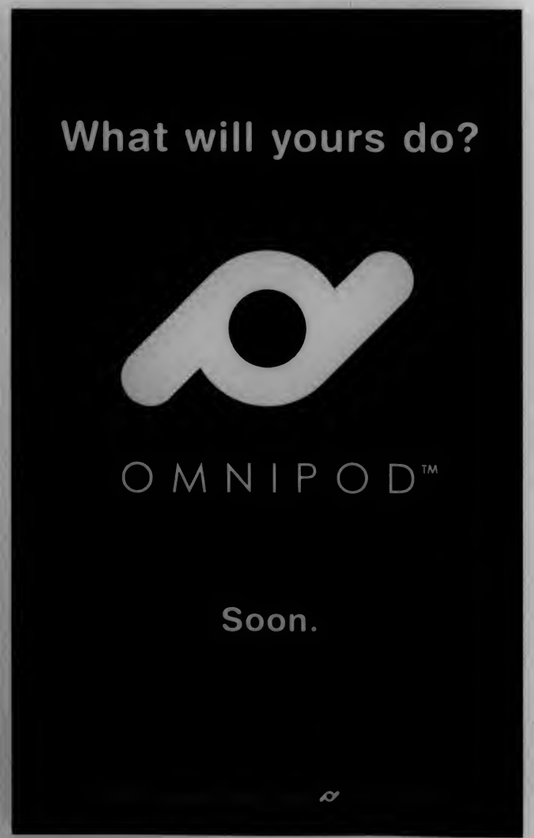
It shouldn't be such a rare pleasure to see a piece of theatre within the five colleges that both moves us to think and feel something of substance while highlighting some of the most talented students in the area. But it is. Fortunately, Mount Holyoke's Theatre Department in collaboration with the college's German Studies and Music Departments, does just that with their current production of Kander and Ebb's Cabaret.

The musical is set in Germany just before the Third Reich begins. An American novelist, Clifford Bradshaw arrives in Berlin hoping to find something to write about. He quickly meets Sally Bowles at The Kit Kat Club, where she performs. A complex but loving relationship ensues between the two. As their plot progresses musical numbers by the Emcee and Kit Kat Dancers compliment their action, as well as details of the subplot of Fraulein Schneider, an elderly spinster, and her prospective husband Herr Schultz, who happens to be Jewish. Bare in mind this is a horrible summary for such a compelling script.

From the first up-last moment of the show every aspect of Mount Holyoke's production is beautifully orchestrated. The artistic and technical designs, the musicians, and the entire cast and crew come together seamlessly to tell a poignant, historic story about what happens when people think, as Sally says in the second act, "Politics, what's that go to do with us?"



And I would have left the Rooke Theatre Saturday night feeling nothing but awe and admiration for the two and half hours I had just spent enchanted by wonderful music, outstanding performances, and a fascinating perspective on Nazi Germany if I hadn't seen the current Broadway production of Cabaret. Then I would have never known how painfully unoriginal Joyce Devlin's direction, Vanessa James' costume design, and Shira Hutt's choreography is.

Perhaps it was pure coincidence, or deliberate, or maybe Devlin didn't realize that people have seen Sam Mendes' Tony Award Winning conceptualization of Cabaret, which is still running in NYC and in national tours. But the most impressive moments of the show, with a powerful tableau, a meaningful shift in inflection, or just a simple break of audience participation—were unabashedly Mendes' rip offs. The costumes were absolutely identical, the choreography only slightly altered to create the same gratuitous statement that the Broadway production unfortunately makes. And (as real issue, then, should address the people who invented the ideas Mt. Holyoke is using: Cabaret doesn't have to be obscene to stir an audience. The score, the script is rich enough to rely on subtlety, rather than overblown, purposely subversive stage pictures and pelvic thrusts.

Still, I loved what I saw and I give credit mostly to the actors. Brian Clowdus as the Emcee was an absolute tour-de-force. Vocally, he was paramount, particularly in the slowed down "I Don't Care Much" and deserves as much praise as anyone can receive for a consistently stunning performance. Karla Brunning as Sally Bowles, another vocal superior, did a fantastic job as the nightclub singer gone domestic and then back to nightclub singer. Her transitions were undaunted and quite effective. The same powerful tableau, a meaningful shift in inflection, or just a simple break of audience participation—were unabashedly Mendes' rip offs. The costumes were absolutely identical, the choreography only slightly altered to create the same gratuitous statement that the Broadway production unfortunately makes. Illegal stick penalty spoils good showing

Collegian Staff

Mistakes in sport ninety percent operator, ten percent equipment. Hence, one can't blame the tools he has for his mishaps. In golf it's the case. Can't blame the club. In baseball, it's the same way. Can't condemn the wood.

But those attending Saturday's matchup between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and Maryland-Baltimore County would disagree. After building momentum in a three-goal first period, John Madigan's three-minute unreleasable illegal stick penalty to begin the second frame got the ball rolling for a stagnant Retrievers squad, as UMBC used the violation to springboard itself to a 9-8 overtime victory.

NCAA rules state that "the head of the cross at its widest point shall measure between 6 1/2 and 10 inches." Madigan's however, was under 6 1/2 inches, and during the customary equipment check between quarters, Madigan's stick was found to be not within regulation standards.

"The official asked me before the game 'do you certify that all of your players have proper equipment and legal equipment?' and I say 'yes,' head coach Greg Cannella said. 'Our players know of what the consequences are.'

"Not only do you get a stick penalty but then you got one of our better attackmen off the field for three minutes."

For 15 minutes, the Minutemen played better than they had all year, outhustling UMBC in response to last week's lackluster performance at Penn State in an 11-8 loss. They wasted little time in rebounding, as Rich Kunkel scored off a pretty feed from Marc Morley with 12:58 remaining in the first. It marked a timely offensive eruption for a squad whose morale was down after struggling so immensely against PSU goaltender Chris Garrits. UMass was piping hot, using crisp passing to set up good looks at the cage. UMBC, on the other hand, seemed rattled, completely out of rhythm, and perhaps shaken after Wednesday's heartbreaking loss at Bucknell.

Madigan and Keith Gabrielli joined Kunkel in the scoring column before the game was even six minutes old, and the Maroon and White could feel the momentum going in its favor. Charlie Gibson put one home with 4:29 remaining to get the Retrievers started, but UMass was still in great shape by quarter's end.

Then came the big blow.

"We were just hoping that we could sustain it and they scored twice to tie it up and that really hurt our momentum," Cannella said. "That was the biggest part of the game. Take those two goals away and who knows what's going to happen."

Luckily enough for the Minutemen, lightning struck twice at Garber, as officials caught UMBC for the same violation. After the Retrievers' Josh Hahn scored as the buzzer sounded to end the first, UMBC now had to fend off UMass' attack. UMass had its opening to regain a comfortable lead. However, UMBC weathered the storm, burning off the three-minute UMass extra-man opportunity to open the second half.

A tricky-tack infringement and the Minutemen are 4-4, sitting in the lower tier of the Eastern College Athletic Conference lacrosse standings. Faced with the toughest stretch of their inaugural season in the league, UMass needed a victory to set the stage for a mid-year run. Unfortunately, the tools in the box couldn't produce one.

quently sidelined. An infraction of this sort forces the culprit to sit the duration of the penalty despite the number of goals that the opposing team nets.

As a result of this penalty the Retrievers tied the game, netting two goals with Madigan sitting out. Josh Hahn got the first at the 13:13 mark when Dan Marohl spotted him cutting to the net. Marohl then threaded the needle from behind the net to a streaking Hahn to chip away yet again. Gibson tallied his second goal of the game when he scored on a lazy, bouncing shot that snuck behind Campolettano.

"We were just hoping that we could sustain it and they scored twice to tie it up," Cannella said. "That really hurt our momentum. That was the biggest part of the game. Take those two goals away and who knows what's going to happen."

UMBC took its first lead of the game when Hahn capitalized on a defensive mishap to give the Retrievers a 4-3 lead.

Kunkel tied the game at four when he scored off another great feed from Morley. Kunkel added his third goal of the day on an EMO. Zach Burke was forced to sit for a minute after a slashing penalty and UMass did not let the opportunity go by the wayside. Madigan was controlling the ball behind the net and found the junior all alone in the left wing. Kunkel then fired a shot past Cusa to once again give the Minutemen the lead with just 4:2 seconds remaining in the first half.

The lead would not be theirs for long as UMBC added a goal as time expired in the first half. Hahn picked up a loose ball in front of Campolettano and as the clock was winding down slipped a shot to the back of the net to tie the game at five.

and was pushed to third when O'Connell knocked a double into center. Senez followed with a double of his own, scoring Morgan and moving O'Connell into scoring position. O'Connell crossed the plate moments later on a Scott Anderson single to make the score 9-5.

After a flurry of hits turned runs midway through, Anderson resurfaced, knocking a single with two outs that drove home Morgan and O'Connell to give UMass the lead for good. The Minutemen padded their lead in the fifth, with both Shaun Skeffington and Gorneault hitting doubles, and Morgan going deep for his fourth homerun of the season. After the game, Stone said that the wind-marked afternoon was tough to sit through.

"I didn't feel comfortable until that last ball was squeezed out there, and it was a pop-up really, and so then it made everybody play for them," Stone said. "It was strange."

The hard throwing Brian Hourigan, whom Stone brought in to power the ball to the plate, picked up the win in relief of Craig Szado, striking out seven in four-plus innings of work to improve to 3-0 on the season. Virginia Tech starter Chip Runyon took the loss for the Hokies, dropping to 4-3 on the year.

Stone again applauded the effort of his team.

"We're down 9-1, it's not looking good," said the 12-year skipper. "But we stayed positive, they hung in there and fortunately responded. It was great. We needed that."

The third game of the series, which was originally slated for Sunday afternoon, was postponed due to rainy conditions. The game has been rescheduled for this afternoon at noon.

back through 12. But he lost his chance for his first major championship when he bogeyed the 485-yard par-5 13th with a mis-hit 5-iron shot from 196 yards out that fell well short and into Rae's Creek as he attempted to make an eagle.

Woods, who started the day six behind, shot 33 on the front and had makable birdie putts at 10, 11 and 13. The first two missed by inches. On the third, he said he misread the break and had no chance.

"I make those, I'm in the ball game at 7-under," he said. "It's disappointing from the standpoint that I didn't win. But at least I gave myself a chance. The golfing gods just were not with me."

Around the diamond

By Jack O'Connell
Hartford Courant

Anaheim Angels left fielder Darin Erstad showed the New York Yankees why their scouts have always preferred him to Jim Edmonds, who was traded to the St. Louis Cardinals.

In the season-opening series against the Yankees, Erstad was 9-for-14 (.643) with two doubles, a home run and six RBI.

Orlando Hernandez in the Yankees' opener and Livan Hernandez in the San Francisco Giants' opener at Miami marked the second time in three years that brothers (in this case half brothers) were starting pitchers on Opening Day. In 1998, Pedro Martinez was the opening day starter for the Boston Red Sox and brother Ramon for the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Texas got the early dividends on the big off-season deal with Detroit. Outfielder Gabe Kapler homered twice in the Rangers' opener and took a .368 average into Saturday. Juan Gonzalez missed all three Tigers games at Oakland because of a sore right hamstring.

Wonder if new Tigers manager Phil Garner still thinks the Indians are "vulnerable" with center fielder Kenny Lofton back three months earlier than expected after having rotator cuff surgery from the senseless dive into first in Game 5 of the Division Series loss to the Red Sox.

With his opening day victory over the White Sox, the Rangers' Kenny Rogers extended his winning streak in home games to 19. The lefthander won his last two home decisions for the Yankees in 1997, all 14 decisions for Oakland last season and both his Shea Stadium decisions with the Mets. The record for consecutive home victories is 22 by the Pirates' Ray Kremer in 1926-27.

Rogers is tied with the Twins' Frank Viola (1987-88) for third place. Second is the Red Sox's Lefty Grove (1938-41) with 20 at Fenway Park yet. Rogers attempted to tie Grove Saturday night against the Blue Jays and David Wells.

Orioles first baseman Will Clark has a 14-game opening day hitting streak. Clark's 1-for-2 against Cleveland raised his career Opening Day average to .393 in 56 at-bats.

Gone with the wind

UM battles weather, Hokies to split

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

You're the Massachusetts baseball team, and you have just lost the first game of a doubleheader against Virginia Tech by one run. In the second game, you're down by eight in the early innings. What do you do?

The answer, my friends, is blowing in the wind.

On Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen hosted the Hokies in a wind swept series at Earl Lorden Field, a wild affair in which both teams settled in and watched the weather play a decisive role. The Minutemen dropped the first game 7-6, but displayed enormous spirit in the nightcap, storming back from an eight-run deficit to win 15-11. Head coach Mike Stone was thrilled with the effort his team checked in with.

"They showed great character," said Stone. "This is a character series for us, to see how we are going to react out there. This is a young ball club that we have, and we have six guys who didn't play last year playing out there defensively, so it was good to see that."

The opener was a classic pitchers' duel early on. UMass starter Travis Veracka allowed only three hits through the first five innings, while striking out six Virginia batters. Hokie pitcher Jason Bush was a near mirror image on the other side, allowing two hits and striking out nine in his first five innings of work.

Virginia Tech (20-13-2) got on the board first in the sixth inning. With one out, junior Addison Bowman hit a solo homerun to left-centerfield that put the Hokies up 1-0. After freshman Marc Tugwell was hit by a pitch, catcher Jed English followed by knocking a two-run shot over the left field fence that gave Virginia Tech a 3-0 cushion.

The Minutemen finally struck in the bottom of the sixth, when sophomore Mike Kulak blasted a homerun off the scoreboard that cut the Hokie lead to two. Nick Gorneault followed with a ground rule double, but was left stranded on base as the game moved into the seventh and final frame.

Virginia Tech picked up where it left off in the sixth, hitting two homeruns that stretched its lead to 7-1. After Spencer Harris scored on a Chad Foutz single, Bowman stepped up and again went deep off the Minutemen for his second homerun of the game. Tugwell utilized the next at bat to hit his second homerun of the season, giving the Hokies their seventh run.

UMass fought back in the bottom of the seventh, scoring five runs to come within one of Virginia Tech. Gorneault singled with no outs, scoring Shaun Skeffington and Kulak to give the Minutemen six runs. Catcher Chris Morgan walked, advancing Gorneault to second, and Kevin O'Connell laid down a perfect bunt that loaded the bases. The comeback was halted, however, when shortstop Aaron Senez hit into a game ending 6-4-3 double play.

Veracka, who worked all seven innings and struck out a career-high nine batters, took the loss for UMass. Bush was awarded the win for the Hokies, striking out 11 UMass batters to improve to 6-3.

In the nightcap, Virginia Tech jumped out early and seemed poised to cruise to an easy win. UMass, however, would have none of it, as the team bore down and delivered its grittiest performance of the season.

After going ahead by two, the Hokies jumped all over the Minutemen in the third, scoring seven runs on five hits to push the score to 9-1. The outburst was keyed by English, whose grand slam in the midst of the rally was his second home run of the day.

Down by a disheartening eight runs, the Minutemen chose not to sit back and watch, erupting for 10 runs in the bottom of the fourth to take over the lead from a surprised Virginia Tech club.

Morgan reached base on an error to lead off the inning,

Take away the precipitation and it was like a midwestern farm on a stormy afternoon.

"Oh God," Coach Mike Stone said. "The fact that we couldn't catch a ball on the other side of the fence was huge. [The wind] changed the whole ball game in a lot of ways. I mean home-runs were like fly balls."

When the Massachusetts' baseball team took the field in the top of the first inning, it did so holding the brims of its caps. And, for the next five innings, it was pretty much the only thing that both teams had to concentrate on doing. The reason: Jason Bush and Travis Veracka were pitching.

Bush, the starting pitcher for Virginia Tech, paced through the first five frames, allowing just two hits and striking out nine UMass batters. His counterpart, Veracka, also glided through the first half of the game striking out six Hokies while allowing just three hits.

Then, the wind picked up and the baseballs began to fly.

In the sixth inning, the 217 fans in attendance watched as three balls sailed over the left field fence of Earl Lorden Field. The first blast was from the bat of V-Tech infielder Addison Bowman. There was never a question to whether it would make it or not. Bowman just stood and watched as the ball landed deep in the awaiting shrubbery. Two batters later, Jed English did the same thing.

"It was definitely tough to pitch in these conditions - a routine fly ball was gone," Veracka said. "But, [Virginia Tech] had to pitch in the same conditions."

In the bottom half of the sixth, UMass' Mike Kulak launched a solo shot that hit the scoreboard in left field. Nick Gourneault followed with a ground-rule double to the similar area. Gourneault then took third as a pickoff throw by English was thrown into left-center field by a timely wind gust. Earlier in the contest, English was fooled by the wind's antics and was unable to retrieve a usually routine pop-up. He looked bedazzled as the ball landed three feet to the right of his fallen body.

"[Coach Chuck Hartman] told me that I really couldn't put the ball anywhere near the middle of the plate," Bush said. "Because [UMass] would just launch it. As far as I'm concerned, we got a lot of breaks that helped us win."

Both pitchers agreed that because of the wind, the movements on their pitches were intensified.

"The wind added a lot of break to my curveball which made it harder to hit," Bush said. "At the same time, if they got it into the air, well it was gone."

"When I was up there, you got that wind blowing right in your face, and if you throw a fastball, it's not going that hard," Veracka said. "The advantage was definitely towards the hitters today. Maybe if it was blowing straight in 45 miles per hour it would have been a little nicer."

The weather was just as harsh in the nightcap.

"It was tough because if you get the ball up it's not good, and if you're not throwing the ball hard you're not trying people up," Stone said. "You're going to give kids more of a chance to get their hands extended and that's one of the reasons why I brought [Brian Hourigan] in because he was throwing hard. I'm glad things worked out and we were able to split today."

Softball on the way up

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Sister kisser, plain and simple. But, for the Massachusetts softball team, hooking up with a strong conference sibling looks promising for a young squad that's on its way to bigger and better dates.

Even though UMass only split its doubleheader at Virginia Tech Saturday, 7-5, 1-3, the youthful Minutewomen sent a strong message to a program that likely had visions of trouncing its biggest Atlantic 10 rival. Not to mention the fact that the Hokies were looking to exact some revenge for last season's Maroon and White sweep at Totman Field, when the conference regular-season championship was on the line.

UMass	7
Virginia Tech	5

UMass	1

And UMass (15-18, 1-1 A-10) delivered in the first game of its conference opener behind the strong hat of freshman first baseman Brandi Cross, who set the tone with a home run in the top of the first inning. It would get worse in the opener for the mighty Hokies (24-15, 1-1 A-10), whom many picked to win the conference this season.

Cross, truly the player-of-the-game and perhaps the most pleasant surprise of the 2000 season, also added a single, a double, and two walks while crossing the plate twice. Behind their infant bats, the Minutewomen stole the game in the final inning, scoring six runs.

With a play-by-play box score that reads longer than a Cicero paragraph as its proof, UMass began the surge when freshman shortstop Emily Robustelli doubled in sophomore Teri Rooney and Cross. The next batter, the team's lone senior Nikki Faessler, brought in sophomore Cherra Wheeler on a fielder's choice.

The floodgates were open.

After a costly VA Tech error, and three more Minutewoman runs, UMass took the field for the bottom of the seventh inning leading comfortably, 7-1. Perhaps too comfortably.

Freshmen pitcher Kaila Holtz, who had pitched marvelously in her other six innings on the hill, ran into trouble. But the Vancouver, B.C. native hung tough, escaping a four-run Hokie rally. Holtz left the mound with a complete-game, roller-coaster victory. Now pitching in the team's No. 1 rotation spot, she improved her record to 8-5 on the season.

Having already exceeded some expectation in their first game on the Blacksburg diamond, the Minutewomen were caught cold at the plate the second time around. The Hokies, meanwhile, decided to strike early, as Michelle Meadows plated a run with a first-inning single. UMass did manage to tie the contest at one apiece with the help of a Cross double, but VA Tech, the new Fortinbra of the A-10, responded with two more runs in the fifth inning to secure the win.

The sophomore co-captain pitched gallantly but took the loss on the mound for the Minutewomen, giving up all three runs and eight hits in six innings. She also struck out two batters and walked two.

The split gives UMass some much needed confidence within an Atlantic 10 Conference that, for the first time in years, does not necessarily seem to be theirs for the taking. After beginning the season at 0-9, the Minutewomen have fought through a slew of injuries, suffering the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune before mounting their charge back to three-games under .500. The recent string of eight wins in their last 10 games has come at the perfect time for UMass, which still must play four of its next 12 contests on the road.

The Minutewomen will next take the field Tuesday at Rutgers, for a 2 p.m. doubleheader against the Scarlet Knights.

Singh claims Masters

By Leonard Shapiro
Washington Post

AUGUSTA, GA. - From the days in the mid-1980s when he was giving lessons to loggers on a jungle golf course in the backwaters of Borneo, Vijay Singh has always been a survivor. Sunday in the 64th Masters, the unflappable Fijian withstood several spirited assaults on his lead by some of the greatest players in the world and beat them all back to claim his second major championship in the last two years.

It did not come easily at Augusta National. First he had to show up at 8:15 a.m. to finish his third-round 70 with four consecutive pars. He went home to rest and think about his strategy, returned for a 2:50 p.m. tee time, then held off a formidable playing partner in David Duval, No. 2 in the world, and withstood charges from No. 1 Tiger Woods early and two-time U.S. Open champion Ernie Els at the end.

He also had to survive a yanked second shot into the pond guarding the 445-yard 11th hole for a bogey and a missed four-footer for a second back-nine bogey at the 170-yard 16th to post a gritty round of 3-under 69 and a total of 10-under 278 for a three-shot victory over Els (68-281) and a champion's check of $828,000.

"I was pretty focused out there all day," said Singh, 37. "Walking up the 18th hole knowing that a two-putt will win the tournament is the greatest feeling I've had in a long, long time. Wearing this green jacket tops it all."

With a two-shot lead over Els and Duval as he walked to the 18th tee, Singh hit a drive down the middle, his second shot within 18 feet of the cup, then holed one last birdie putt, raising his club over his head as the ball rattled down into the cup. He joined 1997 champion Woods, fifth Sunday after a final round 69-284, as the only two men if color to win this event. And Singh's came on the 25th anniversary of Lee Elder's breakthrough as the first African American to play in the Masters. Singh won his first major in 1998 at the PGA Championship at Sahalee, Wash.

Duval got within a shot of Singh after three holes Sunday and was one

Retrievers sniff out win at Garber

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team went into its second consecutive conference match-up in hopes of sniffing out a win after a disheartening loss at Penn State last weekend. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, at games end they found themselves chasing their tails as Maryland-Baltimore County ran away with a 9-8 victory.

The victory was even more disheartening because this time it came in overtime in front of the Minutemen faithful. With 1:33 remaining in the extra session Charlie Gibson drove to the net from the left sideline and fired a blistering shot that beat UMass goalie Chris Campolettano. The game-winner allowed the Retrievers (4-5, 3-2 ECAC) to keep sole possession of third place while the loss dropped the Minutemen (4-5, 1-3 ECAC) into fifth place with the Nittany Lions, giving Penn State the luxury of the tie breaker.

"We're just worried about getting better at this point," coach Greg Cannella said. "I can't worry about what position we're in or anything like that."

It was a game that was seesaw throughout. The Maroon and White jumped out early on the Retrievers and had them playing fetch for most of the first quarter. Two minutes into the opening quarter, Rich Kunkel finished off a beautiful pass form Marc Morely. Kunkel was the beneficiary of great interior passing and superior ball control. The junior found himself along the left post with the entire net to shoot at giving the Minutemen an early 1-0 lead. A lead that they would continue to increase for much of the first frame.

UMBC	8

Kunkel figured in on the second goal as well when he found a cutting Keith Gabrielli at the doorstep of the UMBC cage. Gabrielli made no mistakes as he beat Retriever netminder Steve Cusa to push the lead to 2-0. John Madigan padded the UMass lead yet again when he stole an errant clearing pass and found himself with nothing between himself and the cage. The attacker drove in from the left side, made a quick move on Cusa and delivered a shot that gave the Minutemen a 3-0 lead.

Gibson cut into the UMass lead at the 4:29 mark when he notched the first UMBC goal of the afternoon. The score would remain that way until the start of the second quarter. The start of the second quarter saw the Maroon and White having to kill off a 3:00 extra man opportunity. The three-minute penalty was for an illegal stick. The stick belonged to Madigan who was subse-

Breakthrough NPR host shares insight

By Adam Martignetti

Maria Hinojosa, host of the National Public Radio show "Latino USA" and CNN correspondent spoke last night in Bowker Auditorium.

Maria Hinojosa, host of the National Public Radio show "Latino USA" and CNN correspondent on urban affairs, spoke on "Being true to your voice – breaking through the information divide" yesterday in Bowker Auditorium. The lecture was part of a series put on by the W.E.B. DuBois Library as a part of "National Library Week" in an effort to breech the cultural divide and connect different cultures.

Hinojosa, who once worked with Walter Cronkite on "Where We Stand," talked about being able to use your own voice even if you come from a different background. She discussed her rise in media from NPR to CNN and some of the experiences that have made it difficult for minority voices to be heard.

Hinojosa explained how media has always been resistant to diversity, especially a diversity of opinion.

"The media is determined by a very small group of homogenous men," Hinojosa said. She added, "Even owning the English language has been one of my greatest challenges."

She used the recent example of Elian Gonzalez to illustrate her point. In her coverage of the ongoing event, she focused on a variety of issues that did not occur to either her producers or other news organizations. These included a feature on the aging Cuban woman activists, religious issues surrounding Elian, and various other minorities' thoughts about Elian.

While she was praised for a fresh and new perspective by her bosses, Hinojosa warned, "When you come in with a different perspective or opinion, it is not always easy to get positive feedback."

"Not one perspective is right or wrong," Hinojosa commented.

In another story, Hinojosa recalled how one of her NPR co-workers asked if she had been scared about doing a story in the South Bronx. She said that while she wasn't scared of doing the story, because she had lived in neighborhoods like that, she was scared of entering NPR for the first time. Maria Hinojosa became the first Latina to work at NPR in 1985.

Hinojosa stressed the importance of breaking the information divide that exists culturally. It is thought that such a divide keep minority views out of mainstream media. For Hinojosa, one of the ways to break the divide was to write her second book, Raising Raul.

Raul is an intimate memoir about Hinojosa planning to have a baby and dealing with all the responsibilities that come with that. In the book she deals with the dualities of being both Latina and gringa as she puts it.

An excerpt from the book says, "I couldn't get away from the Mexican yardstick for being a woman that is by having children."

Hinojosa said that is important for people to own their own voices especially in areas of media. She urged people to be proactive in encouraging minorities to step forth in the media. She added that people need to form one-on-one relationships because we are all suffering from untold stories and untold histories.

She also said that network TV news is a detriment to airing serious news. "How can you deal with complex issues in two minutes," Hinojosa asked.

Walk aims at safety strides

By Mary Grein

Students, along with representatives from the University of Massachusetts Police Department, Physical Plant and the Student Government Association will gather tonight to evaluate the safety of the University of Massachusetts campus.

The event is part of the semi-annual safety walk that allows students the opportunity to make suggestions on how to improve campus safety.

Each semester, interested members of the community are split into five groups and given the opportunity to walk around campus in order to distinguish where unsafe areas on campus are.

Organizer Jennifer Texeira, associate speaker of the SGA, said that in the past improvements such as additional call boxes, new lightening and the cutting back of shrubbery have all come out of the suggestions made from the walk.

"One of the top recommendations for call boxes, by the Southwest tunnel will go in this summer," Teixera said. "They [administration] do the best they can, but it's a problem of the budget."

In response to last semester's safety concerns revolving around the alleged assaults, Teixera said that the Campus Center pond will be targeted as one of the areas of safety concerns.

"It's unfortunate events [the assaults last semester] cause people to become more interested and proactive in regards to student issues, but the end result is still good," Teixera said.

On the walk, each participant will complete an evaluation citing where they feel improvements can be made. They are asked to note where any light bulbs or current call boxes are functioning improperly. In addition, notes are made as to where new call boxes would be useful, the condition of the landscape and paths and any other suggestions students might have.

Once the night is completed all evaluations are reviewed and in the past a report has been presented to the Safety Summit Committee.

The Physical Plant is often responsible for making changes on the campus and director Earl Smith said in a previous Collegian article, "It's all about priorities. Things that we can do that are reasonably priced we will fix right away, otherwise we have to wait for funding."

Most often small repairs that have come to the attention of the physical plant are fixed within the next few days of the walk, although for such suggestions as new call boxes a longer process is needed.

Each call box costs about $10,000, creating for a priority list as to where the boxes will be installed each year.

Chief of Police, John Lupipolo who has attended the last few walks, said in a previous Collegian article, "It is a great opportunity to be working together with students and to see the campus at night."

The Safety Walk will be held tonight at 7 p.m. beginning at the Student Union steps. It is open to the public, and all are encouraged to attend.

SGA in-depth

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

In what has been a busy week since the last Student Government Association meeting, rumors have swirled about one possible resignation and one possible impeachment of SGA members. After all that, members of the SGA's Executive Branch still found time to dance.

Last week's meeting saw Senator Zachary Spilman thrown out after only nine minutes in the Senate chamber after he had been warned by Senate Speaker Mikale Billard for interrupting announcements. Spilman had been distributing a memo that had been given to him by Associate Speaker of the Senate Jen Teixeira. The memo identified Billard, as opposed to former president Jeff Howe, as president.

Spilman took umbrage at the memo, pointing out that, because Howe hadn't been sworn in as SGA president, Billard had ascended to the title without knowledge of the Senate. Although he was later sworn in, Howe had apparently not been president for five days. Spilman later returned to the Senate chamber, before being removed by the Campus Center Night Manager Lloyd Henley. His removal was accompanied by harsh words from the Senate floor, including those of Student Trustee Seth Avakian, who shouted at the departing Spillman "don't come back."

With five days since the last meeting of the SGA, some senators have suggested that Spilman be brought up on Rules and Ethics charges. Other have suggested that he be impeached.

"I haven't heard anything about impeachment, but there have been talks about Rules and Ethics charges," Billard said. "But I want to stay away from that issue."

Senator of Grayson Asif Sayani said that he'd heard only through the grapevine that there were those interested in impeaching Spilman or his position being annulled.

"There is a petition going around, but I doubt it would go through because some of the senators are uncomfortable with the idea of him leaving the Senate. Just because he has a very different outlook doesn't mean that he should be impeached," Sayani said.

Howe said that he'd heard of possible charges, but that a timeframe for those charges being brought was up to the Senate.

Central Area Governor Ken Campbell felt that while Spilman had been right, "his behavior has been absolutely questionable. It's too bad he didn't handle it in a different way."

For his part, Spilman revealed that he'd been thinking of stepping down anyway, but he wasn't happy or comfortable with the possibility because that "isn't what my constituents would want."

He said that he hopes anyone bringing him on charges would do so procedurally filed through the Rules and Ethics committee. He said that he's talked to various individuals who told him that, while he was right, his methods of presentation were incorrect.

"Of course, others said that my methods were the only ones," Spilman said. He said he wasn't really concerned with what had happened, rather, what would be facing the SGA. He described "strangely-worded" motions and said that there were big issues in front of the SGA in the

Progress made in Gonzalez case

By Sue Anne Pressley and Karen DeYoung

MIAMI - More than three hours after it was originally scheduled, a meeting between a government-appointed team of mental health specialists and the Miami relatives of Elian Gonzalez finally got under way yesterday to figure out how best to ease the reunion between the child and his father waiting in Washington.

For most of the afternoon, it looked as if the meeting – an important step in the federal government's schedule to remove the boy from the Miami home – was not to be. Initially, Lazaro Gonzalez, Elian's great-uncle with whom the boy has stayed the past four months, failed to keep the appointment with the two psychiatrists and one psychologist named last week by Attorney General Janet Reno to assist the transition.

After a lengthy delay, however, Immigration and Naturalization Service officials and the mental health team agreed to meet Gonzalez at the hospital where his 21-year-old daughter Marisleysis, the cousin who Elian's Miami relatives say has become a substitute mother to the boy, was admitted Saturday. Marisleysis Gonzalez, who did not sit in on the meeting after all, has been hospitalized several times in recent months for exhaustion and stress related to the case.

The meeting was scheduled to take three hours, but lasted one, and the team of experts was headed back to Washington last night.

The Miami relatives already had criticized the mental health specialists because none of them planned to speak with the boy. They continue to state through their attorneys that they will obey the law when the time comes to relinquish the child sometime later this week – but the logistics of that transfer of custody continue to be troubling.

"We are bending over backwards to accommodate them," INS spokeswoman Maria Cardona said yesterday. "Because we feel strongly that this needs to happen in a cooperative way."

In state circuit court, meanwhile, the Miami family made what seemed a last-ditch effort to prevent the boy's removal from their home, filing an emergency petition over the weekend for a quick hearing of their custody case.

GW closes in lieu of WTO protests

By Steven Postal
GW Hatchet [George Washington U.]

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – George Washington University announced Friday it will close this weekend and Monday, April 17, because of anticipated protests of World Bank and International Monetary Fund meetings.

GW administrators met with Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey last week to prepare for the protests. Late Friday, a memo released to the GW community announced the closing.

"As a direct result of discussions with (MPD) who have assessed the impact of the World Bank/IMF meetings on traffic in the area, the University has made the decision to close from Friday, April 14, at 10 p.m. until Tuesday, April 18, at 8 a.m," according to the memo.

Access to residence halls and the Marvin Center will be restricted to GW students and staff. Beginning Monday, "the overnight guest policy for non-GW students will be suspended." Students must have a GWorld card to be signed into a residence hall.

One of the objectives of the closure is to minimize traffic around Foggy Bottom, where the meetings will take place, University officials said. The IMF and World Bank offices are located on 18th and 19th streets near several University buildings.

MPD spokesman Sgt. Joe Gentile said MPD is still in the planning stages for the expected protests. All officers will be on duty and officers will be assigned to the expected demonstrations, he said, although he would not disclose the number of officers that will be assigned to the demonstrations. Civil Disturbance Units were activated Sunday and will continue to patrol through the end of the meetings.

"Students should expect large inconveniences because of large crowds on the streets," Gentile said.

He said a permit to protest has not been approved as of Thursday, and MPD continues to meet with the demonstrators. "(The protesters) have advised us they intend to have a peaceful demonstration," he said.

Gentile said streets will be closed around the IMF and the World Bank, though Thursday he could not say which streets are expected to close. A preliminary list of street closures and blockades will be released Monday, he said. The preliminary list is expected to expand, he said.

"Our actions will be very much dependent on the group," Gentile said. At a Tuesday press conference, IMF Acting Managing Director Stanley Fischer said the meeting planners are taking planned protests seriously. He said authorities are ensuring that the meetings can go on without disruption, but he said activities will not be "absolutely normal."

"The material that is being discussed at these meetings is very important for the operation of the world economy, for the people who live in the world economy," Fischer said. "And you don't really expect that whatever contingencies plans we might or might not have would be made public at this stage."

Protesters already have begun to arrive and protest in certain areas of Washington, D.C. The World Bank and IMF meetings will begin Wednesday morning.

Gone with the wind

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

Minuteman catcher Chris Morgan and Hokie backstop Jed English follow the path of Morgan's fifth-inning long ball that capped UMass' eight-run comeback in diamond action Saturday.

UM battles weather, Hokies to split

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

You're the Massachusetts baseball team, and you have just lost the first game of a doubleheader against Virginia Tech by one run. In the second game, you're down by eight in the early innings. What do you do?

The answer, my friends, is blowing in the wind.

On Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen hosted the Hokies in a wind swept series at Earl Lorden Field, a wild affair in which both teams settled in and watched the weather play a decisive role. The Minutemen dropped the first game 7-6, but displayed enormous spirit in the nightcap, storming back from an eight-run deficit to win 15-11. Head coach Mike Stone was thrilled with the effort his team checked in with.

"They showed great character," said Stone. "This is a character series for us, to see how we are going to react out there. This is a young ball club that we have, and we have six guys who didn't play last year playing out there defensively, so it was good to see that."

The opener was a classic pitchers' duel early on. UMass starter Travis Veracka allowed only three hits through the first five innings, while striking out six Virginia batters. Hokie pitcher Jason Bush was a near mirror image on the other side, allowing two hits and striking out nine in his first five innings of work.

Virginia Tech (20-13-2) got on the board first in the sixth inning. With one out, junior Addison Bowman hit a solo homerun to left-centerfield that put the Hokies up 1-0. After freshman Marc Tugwell was hit by a pitch, catcher Jed English followed by knocking a two-run shot over the left field fence that gave Virginia Tech a 3-0 cushion.

The Minutemen finally struck in the bottom of the sixth, when sophomore Mike Kulak blasted a homerun off the scoreboard that cut the Hokie lead to two. Nick Gorneault followed with a ground rule double, but was left stranded on base as the game moved into the seventh and final frame.

UMass fought back in the bottom of the seventh, scoring five runs to come within one of Virginia Tech. Gorneault singled with no outs, scoring Shaun Skeffington and Kulak to give the Minutemen six runs. Catcher Chris Morgan walked, advancing Gorneault to second, and Kevin O'Connell laid down a perfect bunt that loaded the bases. The comeback was halted, however, when shortstop Aaron Senez hit into a game ending 6-4-3 double play.

UMass	15

Veracka, who worked all seven innings and struck out a career-high nine batters, took the loss for UMass. Bush was awarded the win for the Hokies, striking out 11 UMass batters to improve to 6-3.

In the nightcap, Virginia Tech jumped out early and seemed poised to cruise to an easy win. UMass, however, would have none of it, as the team bore down and delivered its grittiest performance of the season.

After going ahead by two, the Hokies jumped all over the Minutemen in the third, scoring seven runs on five hits to push the score to 9-1. The outburst was keyed by English, whose grand slam in the midst of the rally was his second home run of the day.

Down by a disheartening eight runs, the Minutemen chose not to sit back and watch, erupting for 10 runs in the bottom of the fourth to take over the lead from a surprised Virginia Tech club.

Morgan reached base on an error to lead off the inning,

Mother Nature huffs, puffs and blows baseballs around Lorden

Take away the precipitation and it was like a midwestern farm on a stormy afternoon.

"Oh God," Coach Mike Stone said. "The fact that we couldn't catch a ball on the other side of the fence was huge. [The wind] changed the whole ball game in a lot of ways. I mean home-runs were like fly balls."

When the Massachusetts' baseball team took the field in the top of the first inning, it did so holding the brims of its caps. And, for the next five innings, it was pretty much the only thing that both teams had to concentrate on doing. The reason: Jason Bush and Travis Veracka were pitching.

Bush, the starting pitcher for Virginia Tech, paced through the first five frames, allowing just two hits and striking out nine UMass batters. His counterpart, Veracka, also glided through the first half of the game striking out six Hokies while allowing just three hits.

Then, the wind picked up and the baseballs began to fly.

In the sixth inning, the 217 fans in attendance watched as three balls sailed over the left field fence of Earl Lorden Field. The first blast was from the bat of V-Tech infielder Addison Bowman. There was never a question to whether it would make it or not. Bowman just stood and watched as the ball landed deep in the awaiting shrubbery. Two batters later, Jed English did the same thing.

"It was definitely tough to pitch in these conditions...a routine fly ball was gone," Veracka said. "But, [Virginia Tech] had to pitch in the same conditions."

In the bottom half of the sixth, UMass' Mike Kulak launched a solo-shot that hit the scoreboard in left field. Nick Gourneault followed with a ground-rule double to the similar spot. Gourneault then took third as a pick-off throw by English was blown into left-center field by a timely wind gust. Earlier in the contest, English was fooled by the wind's antics and was unable to retrieve a usually routine pop-up. He looked bedazzled as the ball landed three feet to the right of his fallen body.

"[Coach Chuck Hartman] told me that I really couldn't put the ball anywhere near the middle of the plate," Bush said. "Because [UMass] would just launch it. As far as I'm concerned, we got a lot of breaks that helped us win."

Both pitchers agreed that because of the wind, the movements on their pitches were intensified.

"The wind added a lot of break to my curveball which made it harder to hit," Bush said. "At the same time, if they got it into the air, well it was gone."

"When I was up there, you got that wind blowing right in your face, and if you throw a fastball, it's not going that hard," Veracka said. "The advantage was definitely towards the hitters today. Maybe if it was blowing straight in 45 miles per hour it would have been a little nicer."

The weather was just as harsh in the nightcap.

"It was tough because if you get the ball up it's not good, and if you're not throwing the ball hard you're not tying people up," Stone said. "You're going to give kids more of a chance to get their hands extended and that's one of the reasons why I brought [Brian Hourigan] in because he was throwing hard. I'm glad things worked out and we were able to split today."

Singh claims Masters

By Leonard Shapiro
Washington Post

AUGUSTA, GA. – From the days in the mid-1980s when he was giving lessons to loggers on a jungle golf course in the backwaters of Borneo, Vijay Singh has always been a survivor. Sunday in the 64th Masters, the unflappable Fijian withstood several spirited assaults on his lead by some of the greatest players in the world and beat them all back to claim his second major championship in the last two years.

It did not come easily at Augusta National. First he had to show up at 8:15 a.m. to finish his third-round 70 with four consecutive pars. He went home to rest and think about his strategy, returned for a 2:50 p.m. tee time, then held off a formidable playing partner in David Duval, No. 2 in the world, and withstood charges from No. 1 Tiger Woods early and two-time U.S. Open champion Ernie Els at the end.

He also had to survive a yanked second shot into the pond guarding the 445-yard 11th hole for a bogey and a missed four-footer for a second back-nine bogey at the 170-yard 16th to post a gritty round of 3-under 69 and a total of 10-under 278 for a three-shot victory over Els (68-281) and a champion's check of $828,000.

"I was pretty focused out there all day," said Singh, 37. "Walking up the 18th hole knowing that a two-putt will win the tournament is the greatest feeling I've had in a long, long time. Wearing this green jacket tops it all."

With a two-shot lead over Els and Duval as he walked to the 18th tee, Singh hit a drive down the middle, his second shot within 18 feet of the cup, then holed one last birdie putt, raising his club over his head as the ball rattled down into the cup. He joined 1997 champion Woods, fifth Sunday after a final round 69-284, as the only two men of color to win this event. And Singh's came on the 25th anniversary of Lee Elder's breakthrough as the first African American to play in the Masters. Singh won his first major in 1998 at the PGA Championship at Sahalee, Wash.

Duval got within a shot of Singh after three holes Sunday and was one

Retrievers sniff out win at Garber

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team went into its second consecutive conference matchup in hopes of sniffing out a win after a disheartening loss at Penn State last weekend. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, at games end they found themselves chasing their tails as Maryland-Baltimore County ran away with a 9-8 victory.

The victory was even more disheartening because this time it came in overtime in front of the Minutemen faithful. With 1:33 remaining in the extra session Charlie Gibson drove to the net from the left sideline and fired a blistering shot that beat UMass goalie Chris Campolettano. The game-winner allowed the Retrievers (4-5, 3-2 ECAC) to keep sole possession of third place while the loss dropped the Minutemen (4-5, 1-3 ECAC) into fifth place with the Nittany Lions, giving Penn State the luxury of the tie breaker.

"We're just worried about getting better at this point," coach Greg Cannella said. "I can't worry about what position we're in or anything like that."

It was a game that was seesaw throughout. The Maroon and White jumped out early on the Retrievers and had them playing fetch for most of the first quarter. Two minutes into the opening quarter, Rich Kunkel finished off a beautiful pass form Marc Morely. Kunkel was the beneficiary of great interior passing and superior ball control. The junior found himself along the left post with the entire net to shoot at giving the Minutemen an early 1-0 lead. A lead that they would continue to increase for much of the first frame.

Kunkel figured in on the second goal as well when he found a cutting Keith Gabrielli at the doorstep of the UMBC cage. Gabrielli made no mistakes as he beat Retriever netminder Steve Cusa to push the lead to 2-0. John Madigan padded the UMass lead yet again when he stole an errant clearing pass and found himself with nothing between himself and the cage. The attacker drove in from the left side, made a quick move on Cusa and delivered a shot that gave the Minutemen a 3-0 lead.

Gibson cut into the UMass lead at the 4:29 mark when he notched the first UMBC goal of the afternoon. The score would remain that way until the start of the second quarter. The start of the second quarter saw the Maroon and White having to kill off a 3:00 extra man opportunity. The three-minute penalty was for an illegal stick. Sister-kisser, plain and simple. But, for the Massachusetts softball team, hooking up with a strong conference sibling looks promising for a young squad that's on its way to bigger and better dates.

Even though UMass only split its doubleheader at Virginia Tech Saturday, 7-5, 1-3, the youthful Minutewomen sent a strong message to a program that likely had visions of trouncing its biggest Atlantic 10 rival. Not to mention the fact that the Hokies were looking to exact some revenge for last season's Maroon and White sweep at Totman Field, when the conference regular-season championship was on the line.

Virginia Tech	5

And UMass (15-18, 1-1 A-10) delivered in the first game of its conference opener behind the strong bat of freshman first baseman Brandi Cross, who set the tone with a home run in the top of the first inning. It would get worse in the opener for the mighty Hokies (24-15, 1-1 A-10), whom many picked to win the conference this season.

Cross, truly the player-of-the-game and perhaps the most pleasant surprise of the 2000 season, also added a single, a double, and two walks while crossing the plate twice. Behind their infant bats, the Minutewomen stole the game in the final inning, scoring six runs.

With a play-by-play box score that reads longer than a Cicero paragraph as its proof, UMass began the surge when freshman shortstop Emily Robustelli doubled in sophomore Teri Rooney and Cross. The next batter, the team's lone senior Nikki Faessler, brought in sophomore Cherra Wheeler on a fielder's choice.

The floodgates were open.

After a costly VA Tech error, and three more Minutewoman runs, UMass took the field for the bottom of the seventh inning leading comfortably, 7-1. Perhaps too comfortably.

Freshmen pitcher Kaila Holtz, who had pitched marvelously in her other six innings on the hill, ran into trouble. But the Vancouver, B.C. native hung tough, escaping a four-run Hokie rally. Holtz left the mound with a complete-game, roller-coaster victory. Now pitching in the team's No. 1 rotation spot, she improved her record to 8-5 on the season.

Having already exceeded some expectation in their first game on the Blacksburg diamond, the Minutewomen were caught cold at the plate the second time around. The Hokies, meanwhile, decided to strike early, as Michelle Meadows plated a run with a first-inning single. UMass did manage to tie the contest at one apiece with the help of a Cross double, but VA Tech, the new Fortinbra of the A-10, responded with two more runs in the fifth inning to secure the win.

The sophomore co-captain pitched gallantly but took the loss on the mound for the Minutewomen, giving up all three runs and eight hits in six innings. She also struck out two batters and walked two.

The split gives UMass some much needed confidence within an Atlantic 10 Conference that, for the first time in years, does not necessarily seem to be theirs for the taking. After beginning the season at 0-9, the Minutewomen have fought through a slew of injuries, suffering the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune before mounting their charge back to three-games under .500. The recent string of eight wins in their last 10 games has come at the perfect time for UMass, which still must play four of its next 12 contests on the road.

The Minutewomen will next take the field Tuesday at Rutgers, for a 2 p.m. doubleheader against the Scarlet Knights.

Walk aims at safety strides

By Mary Grein
Collegian Staff

Students, along with representatives from the University of Massachusetts Police Department, Physical Plant and the Student Government Association will gather tonight to evaluate the safety of the University of Massachusetts campus.

The event is part of the semi-annual safety walk that allows students the opportunity to make suggestions on how to improve campus safety.

Each semester, interested members of the community are split into five groups and given the opportunity to walk around campus in order to distinguish where unsafe areas on campus are.

Organizer Jennifer Texeira, associate speaker of the SGA, said that in the past improvements such as additional call boxes, new lightening and the cutting back of shrubbery have all come out of the suggestions made from the walk.

"One of the top recommendations for call boxes, by the Southwest tunnel will go in this summer," Teixera said. "They [administration] do the best they can, but it's a problem of the budget."

In response to last semester's safety concerns revolving around the alleged assaults, Teixera said that the Campus Center pond will be targeted as one of the areas of safety concerns.

"It's unfortunate events [the assaults last semester] cause people to become more interested and proactive in regards to student issues, but the end result is still good," Teixera said.

On the walk, each participant will complete an evaluation citing where they feel improvements can be made. They are asked to note where any light bulbs or current call boxes are functioning improperly. In addition, notes are made as to where new call boxes would be useful, the condition of the landscape and paths and any other suggestions students might have.

Once the night is completed all evaluations are reviewed and in the past a report has been presented to the Safety Summit Committee.

The Physical Plant is often responsible for making changes on the campus and director Earl Smith said in a previous Collegian article, "It's all about priorities. Things that we can do that are reasonably priced we will fix right away, otherwise we have to wait for funding."

Most often small repairs that have come to the attention of the physical plant are fixed within the next few days of the walk, although for such suggestions as new call boxes a longer process is needed.

Each call box costs about $10,000, creating for a priority list as to where the boxes will be installed each year.

Chief of Police, John Luippold who has attended the last few walks, said in a previous Collegian article, "It is a great opportunity to be working together with students and to see the campus at night."

The Safety Walk will be held tonight at 7 p.m. beginning at the Student Union steps. It is open to the public, and all are encouraged to attend.

SGA in-depth

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

In what has been a busy week since the last Student Government Association meeting, rumors have swirled about one possible resignation and one possible impeachment of SGA members. After all that, members of the SGA's Executive Branch still found time to dance.

Last week's meeting saw Senator Zachary Spilman thrown out after only nine minutes in the Senate chamber after he had been warned by Senate Speaker Mikale Billard for interrupting announcements. Spilman had been distributing a memo that had been given to him by Associate Speaker of the Senate Jen Teixeira. The memo identified Billard, as opposed to former president Jeff Howe, as president.

Spilman took umbrage at the memo, pointing out that, because Howe hadn't been sworn in as SGA president, Billard had ascended to the title without knowledge of the Senate. Although he was later sworn in, Howe had apparently not been president for five days. Spilman later returned to the Senate chamber, before being removed by the Campus Center Night Manager Lloyd Henley. His removal was accompanied by harsh words from the Senate floor, including those of Student Trustee Seth Avakian, who shouted at the departing Spilman "don't come back."

With five days since the last meeting of the SGA, some senators have suggested that Spilman be brought up on Rules and Ethics charges. Other have suggested that he be impeached.

"I haven't heard anything about impeachment, but there have been talks about Rules and Ethics charges," Billard said. "But I want to stay away from that issue."

Senator of Grayson Asif Sayani said that he'd heard only through the grapevine that there were those interested in impeaching Spilman or his position being annulled.

"There is a petition going around, but I doubt it would go through because some of the senators are uncomfortable with the idea of him leaving the Senate. Just because he has a very different outlook doesn't mean that he should be impeached," Sayani said.

Howe said that he'd heard of possible charges, but that a timeframe for those charges being brought was up to the Senate.

Central Area Governor Ken Campbell felt that while Spilman had been right, "his behavior has been absolutely questionable. It's too bad he didn't handle it in a different way."

For his part, Spilman revealed that he'd been thinking of stepping down anyway, but he wasn't happy or comfortable with the possibility because that "isn't what my constituents would want."

He said that he hopes anyone bringing him on charges would do so procedurally filed through the Rules and Ethics committee. He said that he's talked to various individuals who told him that, while he was right, his methods of presentation were incorrect.

"Of course, others said that my methods were the only ones," Spilman said. He said he wasn't really concerned with what had happened, rather, what would be facing the SGA. He described "strangely-worded" motions and said that there were big issues in front of the SGA in the

Progress made in Gonzalez case

By Sue Anne Pressley and Karen DeYoung

MIAMI – More than three hours after it was originally scheduled, a meeting between a government-appointed team of mental health specialists and the Miami relatives of Elian Gonzalez finally got under way yesterday to figure out how best to ease the reunion between the child and his father waiting in Washington.

For most of the afternoon, it looked as if the meeting – an important step in the federal government's schedule to remove the boy from the Miami home – was not to be. Initially, Lazaro Gonzalez, Elian's great-uncle with whom the boy has stayed the past four months, failed to keep the appointment with the two psychiatrists and one psychologist named last week by Attorney General Janet Reno to assist the transition.

After a lengthy delay, however, Immigration and Naturalization Service officials and the mental health team agreed to meet Gonzalez at the hospital where his 21-year-old daughter, Marisleysis, the cousin who Elian's Miami relatives say has become a substitute mother to the boy, was admitted Saturday. Marisleysis Gonzalez, who did not sit in on the meeting after all, has been hospitalized several times in recent months for exhaustion and stress related to the case.

The meeting was scheduled to take three hours, but lasted one, and the team of experts was headed back to Washington last night.

The Miami relatives already had criticized the mental health specialists because none of them planned to speak with the boy. They continue to state through their attorneys that they will obey the law when the time comes to relinquish the child sometime later this week – but the logistics of that transfer of custody continue to be troubling.

"We are bending over backwards to accommodate them," INS spokeswoman Maria Cardona said yesterday, "because we feel strongly that this needs to happen in a cooperative way."

In state circuit court, meanwhile, the Miami family made what seemed a last-ditch effort to prevent the boy's removal from their home, filing an emergency petition over the weekend for a quick hearing of their custody case.

GW closes in lieu of WTO protests

By Steven Postal
GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – George Washington University announced Friday it will close this weekend and Monday, April 17, because of anticipated protests of World Bank and International Monetary Fund meetings.

GW administrators met with Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey last week to prepare for the protests. Late Friday, a memo released to the GW community announced the closing.

"As a direct result of discussions with [MPD] who have assessed... the impact of the World Bank/IMF meetings on traffic in the area, the University has made the decision to close from Friday, April 14, at 10 p.m. until Tuesday, April 18, at 8 a.m." according to the memo.

Access to residence halls and the Marvin Center will be restricted to GW students and staff. Beginning Monday, "the overnight guest policy for non-GW students will be suspended." Students must have a GWorld card to be signed into a residence hall.

One of the objectives of the closure is to minimize traffic around Foggy Bottom, where the meetings will take place, University officials said. The IMF and World Bank offices are located on 18th and 19th streets near several University buildings.

MPD spokesman Sgt. Joe Gentile said MPD is still in the planning stages for the expected protests. All officers will be on duty, and officers will be assigned to the expected demonstrations, he said, although he would not disclose the number of officers that will be assigned to the demonstrations. Civil Disturbance Units were activated Sunday and will continue to patrol through the end of the meetings.

"Students should expect large inconveniences because of large crowds on the streets," Gentile said.

He said a permit to protest has not been approved as of Thursday, and MPD continues to meet with the demonstrators. "(The protesters) have advised us they intend to have a peaceful demonstration," he said.

Gentile said streets will be closed around the IMF and the World Bank, though Thursday he could not say which streets are expected to close. A preliminary list of street closures and blockades will be released Monday, he said. The preliminary list is expected to expand, he said.

"Our actions will be very much dependent on the group," Gentile said. At a Tuesday press conference, IMF Acting Managing Director Stanley Fischer said the meeting planners are taking planned protests seriously. He said authorities are ensuring that the meetings can go on without disruption, but he said activities will not be "absolutely normal."

"The material that is being discussed at these meetings is very important for the operation of the world economy, for the people who live in the world economy," Fischer said. "And you don't really expect that whatever contingency plans we might or might not have would be made public at this stage."

Protesters already have begun to arrive and protest in certain areas of Washington, D.C. The World Bank and IMF meetings will begin Wednesday morning.

Indiana U fraternity nixed

By Peter Gelling
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. – The nationals of Sigma Alpha Mu revoked the charter of Indiana University's Sigma Zeta chapter Sunday, according to the officers of the house.

The house will cease to exist on campus at the end of the semester, fraternity members said. The University will released a statement yesterday, said Dean of Students Richard McKaig.

Last week the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity's formal room was adorned with pictures and trophies. But Sunday the room was stripped of all pictures, trophies, couches and tables; the locks were changed.

"It is scary," Sigma Alpha Mu president Adam Potashnick, a junior, said. "Under our noses everything was being swept out."

Representatives of Sammies' national chapter told Potashnick their charter was being revoked on Sunday afternoon. Potashnick said nationals gave no reason other than they have received "allegations." Potashnick said Nationals told members of the house it has received phone calls, but didn't specify what was said in those phone calls. Sammies' National Executive Director Aaron Gilson, who was in Bloomington Sunday night, refused to comment.

Sammies Vice President Gary Manowitz, a junior, said there has been little communication between the national organization and the local fraternity.

"There has been no contact," he said. "We met this afternoon and went back and forth for hours. They gave us no concrete evidence as to why our charter was revoked."

Sammies was charged with hazing in 1998, but Potashnick said the house had served its probation and was no longer in trouble. Sammies were also brought up on alcohol charges early this semester but Potashnick said after going through the Greek Judicial Board process the fraternity was found not guilty. McKaig said he was unable to comment until the statement is released today.

"What I think is going on here Is the national chapter is trying make an example out of us," Potashnick said. "We are the second largest chapter in the nation, and they are trying to show that they will use their authority."

Senior Adam Fohlen, a past executive for the fraternity, said the University has no choice but to comply with a national chapter's authority.

"They have a partnership," he said. "The University has no choice but to work with Nationals."

Besides not knowing what the charges are against the fraternity, members stressed what worried them most was where they would be living next year.

"There are three weeks left in the semester, and we have to find a place to live," Fohlen said. "We have no place to live next year, finals are coming up and Little Five is this weekend."

Mother stalks cyberspace for perverts and predators

By Maria Glod

One man knew her as Noel, a 14-year-old born on Christmas Day who sang in her school chorus and called herself a born troublemaker.

To another she was Angie, a cheerleader with a brand new driver's license and a little sister who twirls baton.

A third man thought she was Sabrina, a 15-year-old blonde who used the computer name Satin Witch.

But she's really a 45-year-old housewife.

And talking to her led to the arrest of all three men.

Nancy Casey – wife, mother of two and master seamstress – hunts Internet predators from the sewing room of a small Pennsylvania apartment decorated with Ricky Martin posters and unicorn stickers. She started last year, fueled by deep outrage that a man her family didn't know sent her teenage daughter a nude photo via e-mail. Now her girls aren't allowed to go online alone, and she's on the Web so often she can barely keep up with her telephone bill.

"I may not be a real little girl, but I know these guys are doing it to real little girls," said Casey, whose undercover work recently led to the arrest of Thomas Cook in Loudoun County, Va. "That's what keeps me going."

Although Casey's methods might be unusual, her mission isn't. The concept of neighborhood watch has moved into cyberspace. Thousands of volunteers worldwide have been rising up to combat child pornography, stalkers and sexual predators on the Internet. As the Web increasingly becomes a part of everyday life – about 44 million households nationwide have Internet connections, compared with 12.7 million in 1995 – online crime has

He said that, as far as he was concerned, he believe the SGA was nothing but a "successful failure." Spilman pointed to statistics that less than 10 percent of all motions passed by the SGA as accepted by the UMass administration, thus rendering, "90 percent of the stuff we do completely worthless."

But Spilman isn't the only one facing possible retribution for his actions; Teixeira might be asked to step down, although senators seemed to have the same foggy notions that surrounded Spilman.

Sayani said he knew that Teixeira and Howe had some problems with communication, but would only say that the possible reason for her being asked to step down was that miscommunication.

Howe though, spoke openly about the Associate Speaker, saying that there are a "lot of people questioning why a memo would be taken from Mike's desk and given to someone. Both ethically and procedurally, there are questions as to why he did what he did."

Howe said that he couldn't even talk to Teixeira, who he described as avoiding him.

As to questions of her being asked to step down, Howe said he supported it.

"She stole a memo and proceeded to do what she could to take away from the credibility of the office of the speaker and president. It is that kind of politics that makes us look like a bunch of fools," Howe said.

During all of the politicking, the Grayson-Field House Council held a semi-formal dance Friday night. Sold out with between 500-600 people in attendance, Howe and Arakian found their way to the center of a controversy when they showed up at the dance at 1a.m. without tickets.

According to Jim Ellringham, a senator from Coolidge, he walked by the Grayson House Council office and saw signs that said the dance was sold out.

"I heard a rumor that they were going to crash the dance, went through their paperwork and Ellringham said 'who signed this,' I would by dismiss you anyway," Howe said.

Fighting not helping

In-fighting in the Student Government Association? As usual, internal politics seem to be grabbing hold of the organization, threatening its stability from the inside.

After producing a document apparently written by SGA President Mikale Billard (when the SGA president has been and will be Jeff Howe), Senator Zachary Spilman pursued the matter until he was thrown out of the Senate Chambers last Wednesday. While Spilman was right to make the point that he did, the point being that constitutionally, Jeff Howe was not president and Mikale Billard was, his presentation of his position was nothing short of disgraceful. He showed nothing but disrespect for his peers, his colleagues and most importantly his organization, the one thing that he should have an allegiance to.

But impeachment? Some within the organization have talked about it. Yes, he was out of line, and yes, he behaved in an extremely immature and unproductive manner, but to be voted from a body for ignorance is inexcusable. His point was correct, and while his presentation wasn't, completely forgetting the apparent error in constitutional judgement as the SGA's executive branch seeks to do does a disservice to the body. There is no real point in having a document of rules and standards and regulations if it goes un-enforced.

President Jeff Howe was wrong in believing that he continued to be president after March 31. The rule clearly states that after that date, the Speaker of the Senate, currently Mikale Billard, would ascend to the presidency, at least until a successor, or in this case Howe, can be sworn in.

And yes, thankfully, Howe was sworn in at the last meeting. As the constitutional issue has been suitably wrapped up, apparently our attention is to be shunted onto Spilman. For his part in it, Spilman should be asked to apologize to the entire Senate for his blatant disregard for respect.

Politicking, however, won't stop with Spilman's apology. Instead, there are also rumblings about Associate Speaker Ien Teixeira's future with the SGA. She originally found the document, although where it was actually found is still up in the air. Howe originally said it must have been found in the trash; today he said it was on Billard's desk. Teixeira said she found it on Billard's desk, leading credo to that statement of finding.

For giving the document to Spilman, some have thought that publicly asking her to resign and then expecting that resignation would be fair. However, it should be observed that Teixeira, while she might have made a horrible decision in who to present the memo to, was in a bind.

She would have had to lead that evening's meeting, something that she was surely prepared for in general, but not in the specifics enough to deal with an impending meeting. Teixeira, inexplicably, trusted the first person she could. Spilman's behavior after the fact was something that couldn't prevent. She merely made a mistake giving the document to him.

The fact of the matter is that after receiving Spilman's apology for his behavior and perhaps asking Teixeria for one from her, the matter should be dropped. The SGA has better issues to deal with than slight constitutional infractions and the misbehavior of a few senators. It is behavior that students do not benefit from, something the SGA should take great strides in remembering. They are not their simply to represent their own interests, likes and dis-likes; they are also their to represent the student body of the University of Massachusetts; a calling markedly more important than the misbehavior of a few.

Going back to Cali? No way

Massachusetts has never looked as good to me as it does now. After two weeks in California, my status as a New Englander has been solidified. I headed out to the land of sun and fun to find something in myself that I thought could not be found in the confines of the Bay State. What I found, however, was a land of confusion.

I believed that in California, I would find my soul mate. I believed that California held the answers I had been looking for all my life. Perhaps I would find my graduate school out there, and perhaps I might discover a modest cottage on the beach for just the right price, turning the cold, hard life I left behind in New England into nothing but a memory. I am an idealist and would have settled for one, maybe two of the things mentioned above but no, it was not to be. My journey to California was an education, but not in the way that I had expected.

When my plane skidded to a grinding halt on the runway of Los Angeles International Airport I discovered that the whole pollution thing – which I had thought was exaggerated – wasn't. I stepped outside and noticed that L.A. doesn't smell like Massachusetts or look anything like it, either. L.A. Story was right; people here take their cars everywhere, and the result is a noxious scent that envelops Southern California.

The idea was simple: rent a car, head up the coast, and find life's mysteries. As it turns out this harder then you would expect. To my surprise life's mysteries apparently don't want to be found, and believe me I looked.

One of my more educational experiences on this trip came in Santa Barbara. I made plans to have dinner with an old friend from high school that I had a crush on when I was just a little tike. She has always had the ability to make me forget that anyone else is in the room. Let's call her Eliza.

Ethan Bergeron

We went to this restaurant on the coast. The moon reflected off the crashing waves, and the smog had died down. It seemed that everything was falling into place; I had my closest friends right there with me, the beauty of the Pacific Ocean and a woman who can stop a clock. I was answering her questions about my life with wit and charm; this was my time to shine. Just at the moment where I thought my life was coming to fruition, an Italian guy walked into the restaurant and sat down with us.

He was Eliza's foreign exchange student boyfriend, Angelo. He had many wonderful characteristics such as the way he murdered the English language, but he understood just enough to insult me with that biting European wit. I had just driven six hours to sit at a table with a guy from the other side of the world who was insulting me, and I was picking up the tab to the tune of $215. With that money I could have bought a cheap gun and some bullets because that is what I needed after I spent two hours with them.

As my friends and I sped back down the coastal highway for L.A., we gazed out the window taking in the giant African trees that they import to give the city that really expensive cheap look. I was pondering the experience that had just occurred when I saw two cars stopped on the side of the highway. I thought to myself: Wow, people here even help each other out.

As it turns out, what they help each other to is others people's cars. I was witnessing a car jacking. This one guy was being thrown from the passenger side of his car and two guys were relieving him of his late model black BMW. I tried to think of what I could do, but before anything popped into my overloaded mind, the L.A.P.D. came speeding to the rescue, or that was what I thought they were doing. To my surprise they didn't stop; they keep going and got off the highway after driving by what to me looked like an obvious crime. This didn't give me a strong sense of security when I found myself lost in L.A. about an hour later.

Apparently I had taken a wrong turn at Albuquerque and found myself in South Central Los Angeles. I'm from Massachusetts and all that people from Massachusetts know about South Central is that you don't want to be there. I did my best to blend in but I think I blew my cover when I asked a woman – at least I think it was a woman and I'm fairly certain she was a prostitute – for directions to the Golden State highway. All I could remember about Long Beach and Compton was what I had learned listening to Dr. Dre on MTV all those years ago, and I don't remember anything about directions to the freeway in his lyrics. So after paying ten dollars for incoherent directions to the highway I decided it was about time to call it night. I found my way back to my makeshift home and let the turmoil that had just occurred melt into my dreams.

So much for finding my soul mate and the meaning of my life.

Pornography: catch the fever, UMass!

I just read in the Globe that in its newest attempt to idealize the UMass curriculum, the Board of Education has announced that all UMass professors will be cut along with the budget, unless they are skilled and educated in the field of pornography, the pinnacle of scholarly knowledge.

This is a good thing, because it's time for pre-registration and I'm really getting excited about signing up for my new major, Porn Studies. I mean, who would not be getting pumped up and turned on over classes like Porno 100: Everything Your Mom Warned You Against, or how about Porno 111: Cum and Get Me Big Boy! All right, maybe I'm a little sick and twisted, but hey, according to most peoples' attitudes towards pornography, it's a "hush, let's not talk about it unless they complain about it" subject.

Jason Trenkle

So I guess that it is an unethical thing to display pornography or even to download it in public places like the library (even though people get it on in there). But it seems to be okay when it's viewed in the classroom and the professor opens a book and starts teaching you about the "10 best ways to cork your best friend's sister."

In fact, if professors can teach it, then why can't students view it whenever they want in class? "By the way, Professor Johnson, I can't study that because I'm much to busy trying to read up on the best ways to make Monica moan."

Well, let's stop kidding ourselves: it is legal speech. I mean anyone can get a hold of it just by turning on the Internet. Why not stop making such a big fuss about it and integrate it into the classroom. Then it wouldn't become so much a problem and we wouldn't be worrying about spending hundreds of dollars on hiring porno trafficking police: "You are under arrest. Put your hands down and spread 'em!"

By not having to fund the smut patrol, we'd be able to save a lot more funding and the University wouldn't be forced to cut computer studies. Let students watch what they want to on television. Honestly, do you believe Chancellor Scott wanted to install surveillance cameras in dorms for safety reasons? Give me a break!

Still, I'm really beginning to catch on to this idea of allowing pornography in the classroom. If a professor is allowed to display it on his computer and talk about it in class, then by all means, everyone should be experienced and have a degree in pornographic studies.

There appears to be something innately artistic about porno. Think about how talented a person has to be in order to come up with the 10 original sex positions or the weirdest come-on lines. That takes art and sophistication, something you can't learn in any classroom. Well, actually, now you can, but I hear it's limited to English majors.

What explanation is there as to why pornographic images and sites are so easily accessible after so much controversy is as much my guess as anyone else, but I do know people really don't want to talk about it because it's considered by many to be a "bad" word and " wouldn't touch it with a 'five inch pole'."

Think about how much money pornographic licensors are making out there by posting pornographic images on the Internet to thousands of people. Forget about the future of computer engineering: the money's all in how well you can show a bunch of paid actors getting off in a group orgy.

In fact, in the new porn classes, being offered for the first time next semester in the English department, students will get to learn how to create your own webpage. Let's give it up for www.likeitwet.com or how about www.joyride.com.

In this class, we'd learn everything from how to fake moaning the loudest and how to stage an orgasm. Do you know how popular these kinds of classes would be? Forget about communications having a class overload, this class would have an unlimited number of openings. In fact, the more students, the merrier. What could be better than having the opportunity to stage a gang-bang with 100 students?

Well, this would of course be a little risqué, but hey, if a professor can display himself fondling women's breasts or even having half-naked women sitting on his lap, then by all means, we should be able to view porn all day, every day, and anytime in class. Honestly, if the administration is going to turn their backs on a professor who displays pornographic material on the Internet and possibly to students, then by all means they shouldn't be monitoring what students view in an educational setting.

Uganda: Recent cult killings and suicides in Uganda have reminded many of similar cult-like deaths in Guyana in the late 70's.

Both Jim Jones' Peoples Temple and Uganda's Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments of God were particular offshoots of Christianity. Both were from relatively poor countries. Perhaps most importantly, both groups were relatively unknown until they disintegrated from within.

Followers of Jones, at least 913 of them, died in the tropical South American nation in 1978. Some of the 913 had been shot by other members of the organization, including Jones who was discovered with a bullet through his brain.

A chapel at the church's main compound burst into flame with 513 members inside, killing them. Followers were locked into the church. Later investigation uncovered mass graves though to contain at least another 400 cultists, were later uncovered.

Both churches required their followers to give their possessions to the church and also required varied styles of communication. Jones' followers had to write him letters and address him as "Dad." Uganda's cultists were forced to speak in a complex form of sign-language, otherwise leading their lives silently.

Furthermore, families were split up into those that believed in the cult and those that didn't who would be described as "evil."

Unlike Jones though, who was killed, the leaders of the Ugandan cult are thought to still be on the loose.

Myanmar: The European Union tightened sanctions against Myanmar, agreeing that the country's military government had only increased repression of both civil and political rights.

After initially banning trips by Myanmar officials to the continent's participating members, removing trade privileges and creating a new arms embargo, new requirements include hand on equipment that might be used for "repression" and also froze the funds of Myanmar's military leadership.

The ban on travel applied to specific members of the regime that control's the nation formerly known as Burma.

Other attempts to force the nation's hand have failed though. EU meetings with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations have been continually cancelled after ASEAN has refused to drop Myanmar from its countries.

Leaders of Myanmar were asked by the EU to "respect human rights, restore democracy and engage in a dialogue with the opposition that could lead to national reconciliation in a united and democratic state."

Every six months, the EU reviews their sanctions. The punishments are design to affect Myanmar's leadership after they refused to turn leadership over to a democratically elected government.

Namibia: Four African nations have asked for a ban on selling ivory to be dropped, complaining that their economy is being hurt while elephant herds are healthy and expanding.

Besides Namibia, South Africa, Botswana and Zimbabwe have all asked the United Nations to allow them to sell Ivory from elephant herds being slimmed down or from natural deaths.

Both Kenya and India, on the other hand, want elephants to remain on Appendix I of the Convention on the International Trade in Endangered Species, the Appendix that bans all trade on any species in it.

Experts claim that numbers of herds have dropped from 1.3 million in Kenya in 1979 when hunting was banned to 650,000 currently. Although the three of the four nations, excluding South Africa, have previously been allowed to sell off their stockpiles of ivory, they could do so only when a system to monitor poaching was put in place.

Obuchi health emergency forces Japanese power shift

By Shawna Megarik
Collegian Correspondent

Japan's Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi slipped into a coma Sunday, April 2 after being hospitalized for complaints of extreme fatigue. Obuchi, 62, is breathing with only the assistance of a respirator and has been given drugs to reverse a catastrophic drop in his blood pressure.

Mikio Aoki, the prime minister's chief cabinet secretary, has currently assumed temporary control of the government. "Mr. Obuchi is currently in a coma and his condition is beyond prediction," Aoki said. Aoki is a key figure in the Obuchi government, but it not considered likely to hold the job permanently. He has worked most of his life in relative obscurity as a local assemblyman in western Japan and as a lawmaker. Obuchi appointed him chief cabinet secretary last October.

The political leaders of the long-governing Liberal Democratic Party planned to meet and there have been indications that they would choose Yoshiro Mori, secretary general of the party, to act as Prime Minister. Others considered to temporarily hold this position have been Foreign Minister Yohei Kono and two former Prime Minister, Kiichi Miyazawa, Obuchi's finance minister, and Ryutaro Hashimoto, Obuchi's immediate predecessor.

There are to be elections held before July, when Japan is to host the Group of Eight summit meeting of economic powers. There are campaigns preparing to unseat the Liberal Democratic Party. The main opposing campaign is a conservative party. For several months now Mori's government popularity has dwindled because of scandals involving public officials as well as high unemployment and a faltering economy.

Japan

Obuchi has worked quietly to obtain his prime minister status.

When he was elected for the job in July 1998, he was written off as a transitional figure. He started his career as a top aid to the former Prime Minister, Noboru Takeshita. Obuchi succeeded so well by serving his masters with patience and by projecting a sense of selflessness and loyalty to his party. He never staked out positions of his own.

The qualities Obuchi used to obtain his position as Prime Minister have been exemplified in his term. He used these qualities to win over a skeptic public. His striking modesty was his most winning attribute during the first year of his term. Obuchi proclaimed that he had no ideas of his own, but would rely on his ability to listen to others to guide his decision-making. His humble style won him strong public support, and he for the first time in his political career began to show signs of personal ambition.

One of his goals was to serve a long time as Prime Minister. He was also eager to welcome the summit meeting of leading industrial nations, which are to take place in Okinawa in July. Obuchi counted on the summit meeting to give him a boost in the elections. This distracted him from other important matters, which have hurt his popularity.

In recent months high-level scandals affecting everything from featherbedding by bank regulators to cover-ups of police misdoing have hurt his popularity. The press has severely criticized Obuchi for his handling of these situations. When a police inspector got caught drinking in a spa and playing mah-jongg with a local police commissioner instead of inspecting the troubled commissaria the was sent to examine, Obuchi was quoted as having remarked to Parliament that the inspector had been "unlucky" to be caught.

Yoshiro Mori, 62, secretary general of the party has quickly emerged as the favorite to within the Liberal Democratic Party to succeed Obuchi. Mori is a Waseda graduate and a 10-term veteran of Parliament. He was first elected in 1969. His previous government posts include stints as construction minister and minister of international trade and industry. He now heads the third-largest faction in the party and has close relations with the party's main coalition partner, the Buddhist-backed New Komeito party.

Mori has been a flawless loyal of Obuchi throughout his term. If Morri is selected, he will more than likely call the new elections quickly so that Japan will not be hosting the economic summit meeting under interim leadership. Yukio Hatoyama is likely opposition to Morri. He is a wealthy heir of an old political family who heads the Democratic party.

There are very few people who expect Aoki to serve as anything other than an interim leader. He has already faced criticism of his exercise of authority particularly because of the way he told the public about Obuchi's health. Other critics have been skeptical about the way Aoki assumed authority. He, Aoki, said he had been asked to do so in a conversation with Obuchi that apparently had no witness.

Japan's constitution is very vague about what should be done when a leader suddenly vacated power. Aoki relied on the so-called cabinet law, which allows a Prime Minister to designate his successor.

This situation for many in Japan seemed to show the unstable nature of Japan's rules of succession and has underscored the attitude among those in power that the public's right to know counts for little in a crisis.

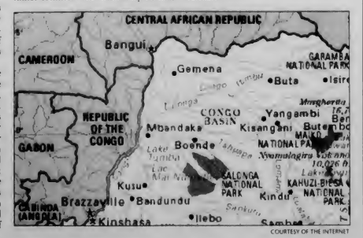
Fighting ceases in Congo

By Bryan D. Smith
Collegian Staff

There is a cease-fire in the Congo, but one would not know this if they were to view what had been going on in one of Africa's largest countries. The aforementioned cease-fire, which had been violated for the last 19 months, has finally come to a much anticipated halt.

The Congo is backed by neighboring Zimbabwe and Angola in attempts to hold off Rwanda and Uganda. Although the fighting has existed for an extended length of time, neither side shows any interest in winning the battle in which it is entrenched.

The fighting has ravaged Congo's economy. The Boston Globe reported that "there were 450,000 cattle in the Goma area six years ago... Today herds are gone. Lost too are 200,000 goats, 100,000 pigs and hundreds of horses... Most of the cars in town are gone, most factories are idle. Hotels are bankrupt... Banks are broke. Further out, farms lie fallow, coffee plantations are neglected. No tourists come." The war has made the economy very volatile and it has yet to be rejuvenated, but there is light at the end of the tunnel now that the fighting has stopped.



Will the United Nation help the Congo in its efforts to maintain the cease-fire? It is trying, but their efforts, as it looks now, seem not to be enough. The operation that the UN has deployed to protect against another uprising of battle will send a meager 5,537 "observers and protection forces" to four sites where they will have to endure a geographic constraint in that there are vast rainforests. The number of protection and observers that the UN intends to send may seem like a lot, but it must be understood that the Congo is roughly the size of Western Europe.

A certain aspect that weighs against the Congo in its attempts to revitalize itself is the integration of Hutu soldiers into its army. "But the primary obstacle to peace remains the interahamwe and former Hutu soldiers, and there is no solution in sight. Many have been integrated into the Congolese and Zimbabwean armies, as well as the rebel forces fighting the Tutsi-led government in Burundi. And as long as they have the means to wage war, Rwanda won't stand down."

This is a perfect example of what Bull and Watson envision for an international society. The idea of what of what they refer to and call an anarchic society. This type of society is hard to control and maintain because each state is under its own free will and can do whatever they see fit to do. They see that there must be a set of common rules that both sides abide by and that it should not mirror that of Eurocentrism. It also gives, in a sense, the idea of what they call an anarchic society. The UN attempts to prevent this, but it cannot, in every instance, get itself involved with minor conflicts. But when they do not, these conflicts escalate and lead to major problems such as this.

Of course the UN cannot intervene in every case, but its duty is to prevent cases like this. There are so many instances where much of the same things have happened on and nothing has been done to try to bring a sense of closure to them. The UN is not doing a good enough job in protecting its member countries, and if it is not protecting them, then what is the purpose of the organization?

Where does this leave the Congo and its ally Zimbabwe? It leaves them in a state of disarray, both economically and socially. With the economy in shambles, the Congo has nowhere to turn in terms of what it might do in the event that Rwanda wanted to deploy its forces in an attempt to take some land from the mineral rich nation. While Rwanda and Uganda occupy the east and the Congo and Zimbabwe stand strong in the west not much will happen until one of the sides decides that they will end their fight and retreat.

Big differences in media: election coverage is funny

With the Presidential election for the United States only months away, the American media has been inundated with stories regarding the campaigning of candidates from both Democrats and Republicans, along with lesser attention on the possible Reform Party or Independent representatives.

However, the United States isn't the only country on the cusp of gaining a new leader. While Americans are pummeled with in depth analyses of the strategies, platforms and characteristics of our own incumbents, on the opposite side of the globe the Russians are also in the middle of campaign fever. The American media obviously has not given the Russian elections the same weight in their reporting, but nevertheless, certain modes have touched on the impending Russian vote.

Catherine Turner

On Thursday, March 23, The Daily Show with Jon Stewart was one of those media modes reporting on the elections in Russia. This popular news programmed offered up by Comedy Central, does not have the prestige that, say, the New York Times has, considering their slogan is, "where more Americans get their news than should," but they do tend to cover world headlines, even if they're doing so just to get a laugh.

In comparing this electronic media with a printed article on the same subject in the New York Times, Saturday, March 25, 2000, it is blatant that the Times does a better and more thorough job describing the Russians than The Daily Show, even if it isn't nearly as funny.

Jon Stewart's report of the Russian incumbent Vladimir Putin followed the nightly update of the American Presidential race humorously titled, "Indecision 2000" where Daily Show correspondents lightly tousle about electoral issues. On the March 23 edition, the "Indecision 2000" piece was then followed with its Russian version, "Indechisnsky 2000-tlas."

Jon Stewart remarked on how candidate Putin was trying in a last minute effort to boost his popularity. They showed a picture of Putin in his "heady KGB agent and would-be assassin days" with an unbuttoned shirt and intense gaze. Then they showed the same picture of Putin with the words "I love kittens," written under it. This poke at Russian Politics was merely just a plos to get a laugh, and it succeeded. The show shortly moved onto another subject.

Then there was the Times coverage of the Russian elections. A story written by Reuters titled, Russia's Putin Steals Limelight Before Vote, and is exceptionally longer than the Daily Show piece. The Times goes into great detail, describing the number of eligible voters in Russia (over 108 million people across eleven time zones), and actually goes into depth about Putin's platform promoting democracy and freedom.

The Times does a much better job describing not only Putin's lead, but the positions of other candidates as well, including liberal leader Grigori Yavlinsky. The article is also broken up into sections covering the Western perspective on the elections and touches on issues of concern for both countries such as oil and the situation in Chechnya.

While The Daily Show with Jon Stewart doesn't claim to report the news with any sort of prestigious accuracy or seriousness, it does play a role in the news business, because it does draw in viewers and expose them to important headlines. It is also fun to watch because it is so fun and succeeds in making fun of the American system. But when it comes time to be really informed and get a closer, analytical look at events taking place not only in this country but around the world, it is better left to the news professionals at the New York Times.

No matter where you get the news it is hard not to hear about the elections and the horse race they're turning out to be. But it is also nice to know that even the Russians are getting their slice of the investigative election reporting pie as well.

AIDS remains a killer; Southern Africa suffers

By Corrie Sheffield
Collegian Staff

By 2010, the AIDS epidemic in sub-Saharan Africa will leave the country with 71 million fewer people than it would otherwise, that's 41 million more people killed by AIDS than were killed by the Bubonic Plague in Medieval Europe.

Increasingly sophisticated treatments have cut the AIDS death rate in the industrialized countries, but elsewhere the epidemic is gathering momentum. Ten out of the 11 infections that happen each minute happen in sub-Saharan Africa. Doctors and nurses are dying faster than they can be replaced and treatment ranges from inadequate to nonexistent.

The Zambian government stepped up the fight against AIDS last month establishing a national council and secretariat to coordinate a campaign against AIDS. Other African countries, such as Zimbabwe, Botswana, Namibia and Swaziland have also begun to make strides in their AIDS treatments and preventions.

But in South Africa, where one out of every 10 people has AIDS, governments such as President Thabo Mebki's have stunted the development for treatment. President Mebki has disconcerted many by opposing the use of the drug AZT, one of the most sucessful AIDS drugs, and by appointing an AIDS council that lacks medical researchers and AIDS experts.

Children in Africa are seeing their parents and grandparents die of AIDS in rapid sucession. Eighty percent of those dying from AIDS in Africa are workers between the ages of 20 and 50 – workers in their prime. In 2010, there will be an estimated 40 million AIDS orphans in Africa left to survive on their own, most of whom will have grown up with little or no social structure.

The spread of AIDS in pandemic proportions is due to poverty, ignorance, the prohibitive cost of AIDS drugs, an aversion to discussing sex and, some say, promiscuity. Dr. Robert Shell of the Population Research Unit at Rhodes University in Grahamstown, South Africa stated, "Promiscuity is a loaded word. I would say that AIDS is a result of unsafe sexual practices, and unguarded sexual behavior is the most important factor. Ignorance about reproductive health is the biggest factor [and it] is related to poverty and illiteracy. Ten percent of the Africans in my province have other sexually transmitted diseases."

The study is compounded through the lives of many African men as migrant workers. The men rarely get tested and due to their mobile lifestyle often visit "commercial sex workers." Of prostitutes, 90 percent of whom are believed to have AIDS.

The AIDS epidemic that has taken hold of sub-Saharan Africa and spreading throughout the countries has the potential to destabilize the global economy and has fueled worldwide concern. "Many of us used to think of AIDS as a health issue," James Wolfensohn, president of the World Bank, told the U.N. Security Council. "We were wrong. AIDS can no longer be confined to the health or social-sector portfolios. AIDS is turning back the clock on development."

Researchers are working on an AIDS vaccine, but such a medicine is still years away. Prevention programs can, and do, help but an effective and comprehensive prevention program for sub-Saharan Africa would cost $2.3 billion a year and African nations spend only $165 million a year to combat AIDS, and it all comes from the industrialized nations. The fear is growing in other countries and "If we don't work with the Africans themselves to address these problems," U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Richard Holbrooke said in January 2000, "we will have to deal with them later when they will get more dangerous and more expensive."

Elton's sounds move Mullins

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

For a man with as much status and as many accolades as Elton John, the legendary singer/songwriter gave an amazingly gracious performance at the William D. Mullins Center on Saturday night.

Approaching his piano with glitter on the back of his coat and a standing ovation in the vast expanse in front of his red-tinted glasses, John wasted no time beginning what would become a three-hour show without the benefit of an opening act.

John started things up with "Your Song" a fan favorite, and, upon finishing, rose from his seat to face another ovation. The singer took a drink from what looked like a can of Schweppes, nodded to each section of the crowd that surrounded all sides of the stage, and returned to his seat.

The routine continued the rest of the evening, but neither the accomplished songwriter nor the Mullins Center faithful grew tired of it. John played a song, sometimes two, and would rise to greet and acknowledge the sea of loyal fans that would faithfully leave their seats as well. Whether it was the fans reacting to John or John reacting to the fans is hard to say, but the kinship forged in one evening between the two was uncanny.

Elton John gave a super-swell performance this Friday night.

The stage setting was grandiose with a royally decorated tapestry hanging above John's platform. Protruding from the center of the tapestry was an elaborate, tentacled chandelier, that was equipped with colored lights and effects to pour onto the crowd. Closer to the roof of the building and to either side of the performing area, hung two 15-foot wide screens that showed John close-up while he was playing. Powerful stadium lights hidden in the cloth above slowly, but precisely, altered the hue of the atmosphere as the show progressed.

John took it easy on the piano for the first fix to six songs, following the melodies of tunes like "Daniel" with a captivating grace, before he broke into "Honky Cat" and began to pound on the ivory. The singer entertained the crowd with improvised jamming on the faster-paced song, before continuing on with his set.

The meat of the evening included "Somedav" during which the screens showed scenes from the song's source movie The Road to El Dorado, and "Empty Garden", an audio and visual tribute to former Beatle frontman and civil rights activist John Lennon. Perhaps the highlight of the middle range of songs was "Rocket Man", in which planets and stars were graphically melded with the shots of John playing live, while the chandelier sprinkled the audience with small celestial bodies.

After he finished a souped-up version of "Burn Down the Mission" John returned once again to the clamoring group pressed against his stage, and this time not only accepted their flowers and gifts, as he had done all evening, but also took some time to sign autographs before finishing up the initial portion of his show with a crowd sing-a-long of "Crocodile Rock" and "Don't Let the Sun Go Down on Me".

The artist's first encore, that came with fairly little audience cohersion, included "Can You Feel the Love Tonight" with scenes from the movie The Lion King displayed and "Bennie and the Jets."

The second encore, which appeared significantly less rehearsed – what with John returning to the stage after a long wait in what looked like pajamas – put an exclamation point on the show with "Candle in the Wind."

Before leaving the stage a final time, John bowed to each section of the Mullins Center and graciously thanked the crowd for their support over the years, leaving those in attendance with an unquestionable feeling of closeness with a musician of unmatched stature.

Daisies of the Galaxy a journey through charming folk-pop melodies

By David Troupes

Eels
Daisies of the Galaxy
Dreamworks

The Eels are actually one guy, Mark Oliver Everett, who goes by the moniker E. E plays most of the instruments on the album himself and produced the album, although he does makes use of both touring musicians and studio guest players, making the Eels something like Beck. Daisies of the Galaxy, the third Eels album (previous to the Eels, two albums were released under the name E), has more than organizational similarities to Beck's music, containing a charming combination of acoustic folk/pop arranged with an appealing looseness of style – think of what Mutations would sound like if it were produced by Adam Schlesinger of Fountains of Wayne. You can also hear a lot of Wilco's Summerteeth in E's songwriting and production techniques.

Daisies opens with "Grace Kelly Blues," a simply acoustic tune backed by horns and lasting over three and a half minutes – quite long for this album. "Packing Blankets" barely exceeds the two-minute mark at 2:07, but the song never feels rushed or neglected. Each track on this album is a like a quick fix of musical happiness, and lyrics such as, "And all our troubles will be gone/blowing out over that bridge/floating up into the sky/making the storm clouds cry" keep the mood light and unassuming. The album continues with "The Sound of Fear," a keyboard-dominated song that conjures up strong notions of Beck.

E sings with a rough vocal sincerity that can take a bit of getting used to, but his coffee shop folk singer style (again begging comparison to Beck and Wilco) complements well the quirkiness of his music and unpolished style of production.

Daisies of the Galaxy contains numerous little gems of songs, including the title track, a mournful, solemn song constructed from a thin electric guitar and excellently arranged orchestration, and "Jeannie's Diary," a song of unrequited love that walks the line between sappy and endearing perfectly. "Estate Sale," a short instrumental piece co-written by Peter Buck is another surprising treat: at barely a minute and a half, it does a marvelous job of reigning in the emotional weightlessness of much of the rest of the album. Of the musicians who helped E record the album, Peter Buck is the most notable collaborator; Buck comprises one-fourth (recently one-third) of REM, and although he generally plays guitar, he spends most of his time with E on keyboards and piano.

Daisies of the Galaxy offers 14 tracks and one bonus track, all of them highly listenable. Music like this is a breath of fresh air in an industry whose idea of innovation has become little more than yelling louder and slamming the guitar faster than the guy who came before you. As E so irresistibly offers in "I Like Birds," my personal favorite track from the album, "If you're small and on a search/I've got a feeder for you to perch on." A

Some rocking music from a bunch of crackers

Cracker

"What the world needs now is another folk singer/like I need a hole in my head' - Teen Angst (What the World Needs Now)

They aren't lying. Stuck in a glut of slower, less rocky music, singers today seem more inclined to slow it all down in an attempt to appeal to everyone's more emotional track. David Lowery, Cracker's lead singer, doesn't seem to give a hoot about appeal.

Rather, he and his band give it their all on their songs with what feels like a take it or leave attitude. They are an American rock band, culling the best of country and blues, blending them with good old rock and roll, and in the end, producing great music.

Cracker's latest album, a double disc, Garage d'Or, should definitely be taken. Without question, the first disc, a collection of greatest hits from their past four albums, reveals a band that does nothing but play hard, and in lead-singer David Lowery's case, sing until his raspy voice sounds ready to give out. The second disc, a collection of various outtakes, sufficiently does its job giving us insight into songs not yet finished or ones that have died, left only to collect dust.

Never quite reaching the lofty heights that some thought they might achieve, the band only ever gets played when "Low" is on the radio, but that song was enough to get me hooked on the band. However, I listened to Kerosene Hat and it really didn't click with me. Just sounded like some rock songs.

Somewhere along the line, I was really missing something. The sixteen songs on the greatest hits disc show it. Everything from Kerosene Hat is better than I remembered, and everything from their first and latter albums, all of which fell on mostly deaf ears, was even better.

"Stuck in a glut of slower, less rocky music, singers today seem more inclined to slow it all down in an attempt to appeal to everyone's more emotional track. David Lowery, Cracker's lead singer, doesn't seem to give a hoot about appeal."

The album's first song, quoted above, is a hard-driving guitar driven song, slow riffs mixed between quicker more piercing ones and a real thumbing-our-noses at music in general attitude. Lowery recommends that "What the world needs now is a new kind of tension / cause the old one bores me to death" and that "What the world needs now is some true words of wisdom / like la la la

Indie art finding increased mainstream attention

By David Doley
Hartford Courant

British folk singer Nick Drake overdosed on antidepressants and died in 1974 at age 26, after recording three morose masterpieces: the albums Five Leaves Left, Bryter Layter and Pink Moon.

Until recently, Drake had been as obscure in death as he was in life, championed by musicians, cultists and dedicated followers of the unfashionable, but otherwise almost entirely unknown. Now he's almost unavoidable.

His song "Pink Moon" inspired the Volkswagen Cabrio commercial in which friends are cruising in their convertible, listening to Drake as a pink moon shines above them. They're so magically transported by his playing, and probably the car as well, that they just keep driving past their party destination.

The dreamy spot also has driven Drake's record sales to unheard-of heights. Suddenly the obscure are being celebrated – even on a stage as large as the Oscars. Boys Don't Cry star Hilary Swank and director Kimberly Peirce weren't well known outside indie-film circles before last summer. But their performances in the riveting film won attention, and something else rarely given those outside the public eye: Academy Award nominations. Swank won the Oscar for best actress. Sevigny was the unlikeliest nominee in a category filled with them. The best-supporting-actress field included all past- and present indie-film icons, such as Catherine Keener (Your Friends and Neighbors, Being John Malkovich) and Toni Collette (Cocksuckers then The Sixth Sense).

Indeed, if the Oscars felt a lot like the Independent Spirit Awards – the alternative Academy Awards designed to recognize the year's real best films – perhaps that's because the nominees were so strikingly similar. Both shared Swank, Sevigny, Janet McTeer (Tumbleweeds), Spike Jonze and Charlie Kaufman (Malkovich). Richard Farnsworth (Straight Story), Paul Thomas Anderson (Magnolia) and Alexander Payne (Election).

Everywhere there are examples of the mainstream merging with the margins, and of popular success for books, bands and performers who certainly are shaking their heads at the bizarre cultural moment they stumbled into.

At the Grammy awards, electronica pioneer Moby's song "Why Does My Heart Feel So Bad" was performed by Elton John.

Dave Eggers, who left Esquire disgusted with the compromises necessary to put out a mass-market magazine, is fourth on The New York Times nonfiction best-seller list, with "A Heartbreaking Work of Staggering Genius." HBO's "The Sopranos" is the most talked-about water-cooler show.

Such success was once seen suspiciously, or derided with catcalls of "selling out." Now members of Sleater-Kinney – the fiercely independent, female punk trio that's one of alt-rock's greatest treasures – are backing William Shatner in those ubiquitous Priceline ads. And that's Liz Phair on the back of New York buses modeling Calvin Klein, and Moby high atop a CK billboard at Broadway and Houston, the streets where New York's Greenwich Village intersects with SoHo and style is born.

"It's hard to dismiss everybody as shills for advertising when Liz Phair, Korn, Moby and Sleater-Kinney are doing it," said John Seabrook, author of the new "Nobrow: The Culture of Marketing, The Marketing of Culture."

This isn't to say everything's wonderful. Radio remains a vast wasteland, and the promise of modern rock has long since vanished into the schlock of the new. Acclaimed TV shows such as Freaks and Geeks still get just a handful of episodes to prove themselves.

Yet as viewing and listening audiences keep fragmenting, two things are happening. Confused programmers and studio heads dive toward the lowest common denominator in search of easy hits, such as another night of game shows, car chases and news magazines. And they're experimenting with an "anything goes" glee in search of their own buzz. The never-ending quest for buzz, driven by more media than ever, has elevated a new mix of cool culture to prominence. It's not replacing the old, but finally it's allowed to exist along with it.

That means new shows such as Malcolm in the Middle and Wonderland. And it means movies such as Malkovich, Magnolia, Three Kings and Boys Don't Cry playing at the mega-theaters and out of art cinema purgatory. 'N Sync, Regis Philbin and wrestler autobiographies might top the charts. But suddenly, sharing space next to them at the multiplex and the mall are the interesting books and bands that have never been anything more than cult favorites.

And the kind of critics usually suspicious of corporations and cranky about the culture can't believe what they see.

"Everything in this country is getting better and better," said Ira Glass, who hosts National Public Radio's "This American Life." "The culture is in an unusual mood of great openness. ... It's not clear what people are going to buy, so there's a lot of experimenting, especially with TV and film, to see what will fly. It's a lovely moment. There will be a point when we look back on this time in amazement."

'Skins' draft list stocked

By Mark Maske
The Washington Post

The pizza delivery guy walked through the front door at Redskin Park late one night last week and wondered where to go. Anyone with a calendar and a knowledge of how the NFL works could have told him his destination – the Washington Redskins' draft war room.

A caller to the office of Indianapolis Colts President Bill Polian the same day was told by his secretary: "He's in a draft meeting." Was there a good time to call back? "No," she said. "He's always in a draft meeting this time of the year."

The story is the same for every NFL team, as club executives, scouts and coaches make final preparations for this weekend's college draft. It is the last-minute cramming at the end of a player-evaluation process that is becoming ever more exhaustive.

For the past few weeks, Redskins officials have held daily draft meetings, from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. or beyond. Scouts, director of player personnel Vinny Cerrato, Coach Norv Turner and the relevant assistant coaches ranked available players in position-by-position breakdowns. Two week ago, the Redskins assigned each defensive player a round to reflect their evaluation of his draft-day value. Last week, the Redskins did the same for offensive players. This week, the club will combine those lists into an overall draft board, with players ranked from 1 through approximately 170.

Saturday, the Redskins have the second and third selections in the first round of the two-day, seven-round draft, and what happens could go a long way toward determining if they will be a Super Bowl contender for years to come. Whether they make a draft-day trade involving New York Jets wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson or come away with two players from among the trio of Penn State linebacker LaVar Arrington, Penn State defensive end Courtney Brown and Alabama tackle Chris Samuels, the Redskins know they cannot afford to be wrong.

impressive poise and control as he worked his way through the Minuteman lineup. With the complete game victory, Saunders pushed his record to a team leading 7-1. Stone praised the young southpaws performance.

"He was tough, he just stuffed us all day," said Stone. "He's a pretty good pitcher."

The Hokies continues to pad their cushion late in the game, striking for four runs in the top of the seventh to go up 13-0. The Minutemen countered by shaking up the lineup, replacing the position players in part to spark the team, and in part to take possible injury out of the equation.

"On Saturday the games weren't over, and we came back," said Stone. "Here we just weren't competing well enough, so why take a chance on somebody getting hurt and costing them the rest of the season?"

The Minutemen will next be in action on Thursday, April 13, when they travel to Boston to battle the Northeastern Huskies.

on the team. In the doubleheader against Virginia Tech on Friday, she went 3-6 with a home run, two runs scored and two RBI in the two games. All of this has established her as the best hitter on a team already loaded with hitting talent.

Joining Cross in the middle of the lineup will be sophomore center fielder Teri Rooney (.296 AVG, 1 HR, 20 RBI), sophomore third baseman Cherra Wheeler (.278 AVG, 1HR, 17 RBI) and steady senior catcher Nikki Faensler (.260 AVG, 14 RBI). For opposing pitchers, getting past these four batters without getting into trouble will be the equivalent of avoiding hotels on Boardwalk, Park Place, and the green squares in Monopoly.

For Rutgers, the challenge of stopping the UMass batting order will most likely fall on the shoulders of ace Leah Black. Black is 9-4 on the year with a 0.64 ERA, and is riding a four game winning streak that began against Seton Hall over a week ago. Center fielder Danielle Dolbow (.415 AVG, 2 HR), and shortstop Debbie Dejung (.315 AVG, 5 HR) lead the offense, and will try and improve the team's 15-10 (2-4 Big East) record.

Helana Horek got the Minutewomen back on the right track by winning her second straight singles match by sweeping Alexandra Cazangui 6-0, 6-0.

UMass continued their assault by winning the next two matches behind Annie Hamilton's third straight singles victory, this one coming at the hands of Morgan Brinley, Katie Stanmeier trounced Emily Najour 6-2, 6-2.

Griffey's greatness engraved in history

Ken Griffey Jr.'s fourth-inning home run at Coors Field in Colorado yesterday afternoon marked a lot more than just a standard round-tripper for the 10-time All Star.

11 years to the day after his first major league home run, that particular piece of yard work off Rockies' starter Rolando Arrojo represented the 400th homer of the 30 year-old centerfielder's career, making him the 30th player in history to reach the 400 home run plateau. He trails only St. Louis' Mark McGwire (525), San Francisco's Barry Bonds (447), Tampa Bay's Jose Canseco (431) and Baltimore's Cal Ripken Jr. (403) among active players with 400 home runs.

Despite the hallowed hardball presences on that list, "Junior" enjoys a number of distinctions that will more than likely place him high above his counterparts in terms of sheer baseball infamy once he finally hangs up his spikes.

The first and most obvious honor that will warrant Griffey's baseball immortality is the almost frightening age at which he has already excelled. Griffey is the youngest-ever player (at 30 years, 141 days) to reach the 400-swat plateau, beating out former Red Sox slugger Jimmy Foxx. The "Double X" formerly held that distinction after reaching the milestone in 30 years, 248 days. Griffey has already passed the likes of Joe Dimaggio, Ralph Kiner, Johnny Bench, Tony Perez and Jim Rice on the all-time home run list. An even more frightening statistic is the fact that on his current rate, New York Mets' shortstop Rey Ordonez would have to play another 396 seasons to match Griffey if the Reds' star did not plan another game.

The second honor that will leave Griffey in baseball immortality will be the chase for Hank Aaron's all-time record. Griffey is now 355 homers behind "Hammerin Hank" with still a good decade of ball ahead of him. On his current pace, if Griffey plays another 10 seasons, he will break the record for homers by the time his career is done. For his career, Griffey is averaging 36 big flies a year, but has 208 home runs in the past 4 seasons. He is realistically the biggest threat to Aaron's record. Even though McGwire has hit an astonishing 50 dingers for every 162 games played, he is 35 and back injuries over his career might force a halt to his quest. Griffey is five years younger and has had fewer debilitating injuries than McGwire over his 11-year career. Also, with a ballpark tailor-made for his swing, and the watered-down pitching the opposition has to offer, he will have a great shot at being the "King of Swing."

The third distinction is his flare for the dramatic. Although he only has one walk-off home run in his career, he always comes up with something spectacular. Whether it is going over the wall to rob the opposition of round trippers or his amazing catches that he makes look routine, he has had a flare for the dramatic since he came into the league. On September 14, 1990, at the age of 20, he teamed up with his father, Ken Griffey Sr., to become the only father/son combination to hit back-to-back jacks in one game. In 1993, he tied a Major League record by hitting at least one home run in eight consecutive games.

Also, Griffey will always be remembered as the hero of one of the greatest postseason series in Major League history. In the 1995 American League Divisional Series against the New York Yankees, Griffey hit five Jacksonesque shots, which tied a major league record for most home runs in a series. And it was his all-out dash to the plate after Edgar Martinez's double in the 11th inning of game five that won the series, and will live in the minds of baseball fans for years to come.

He will also be remembered for not thinking all about the Benjamins when it came to where he played for the rest of his career. Although 117 million dollars over nine years is still 117 million more than I have, in this time and age where more and more athletes are signing outrageous contracts, Griffey's deal was a bargain. When he was being offered 50-40 million dollars more by the Mariners, he didn't go for the money; he went home.

He went back to a place where his father was a part of one of the greatest teams in baseball history, "The Big Red Machine." He also said happ birthday to Dad by hitting his 400th on his father's 50th birthday. Not only that, the elder Griffey is now the hitting coach with the Reds, and is now destined to become manager when current skipper Jack McKeon leaves.

However, with all his individual accomplishments, the burden of expectations goes along with him. With the entire fanfare that came with his departure from Seattle to the Reds, he was brought to Cincinnati to do one thing: win a World Series Championship. He has never had that feeling in his big league career (thanks a lot Norm Charlton and the rest of the crew). With all the numbers that he has put up, his career might ultimately be judged on whether or not he wins a championship ring.

He has only made the postseason twice in his big league career and that leaves a huge void on all his individual accomplishments. He does not want to join a distinguished list. No one wants to be known as a great player who never was able to win a championship. It has cast a big shadow over the careers of such legends as: Dan Marino, Fran Tarkenton, Tony Gwynn, Ted Williams, Patrick Ewing, Charles Barkley, Karl Malone, Ray Bourque, and Dominik Hasek. All great players who came close, but could not put their respective teams over the hump. If Griffey never leads the Reds over that hump and wins the coveted championship, he will leap over these all-time greats and hold the infamous honor as, "The Greatest Player Never to Win a Championship."

Now is his time. He has a great lineup in Cincinnati with players such as Barry Larkin, Sean Casey and Pokey Reese in the same lineup. He also is on a team that has pitching, something he never had in Seattle with the exception of Randy Johnson. The bullpen is solid from the middle relief all the way to Scott Williamson at the end, who had 19 saves and was the National League Rookie of the Year in 1999. The time is now for Griffey. He has everything he wanted, playing back where his father played, in a ballpark that suits his swing, with a pitching staff that is solid for the first time in his career. This is his best chance to win a title.

However, even if he never wins a championship, his place in baseball history is already etched in stone. He helped save a franchise in Seattle with his heroics in 1995. He was the American League Most Valuable Player in 1997, he is one of only four men to hit 50 homers in back-to-back seasons and he is a part of Major League Baseball's All-Centurys Team. In the immortal words of Chris Berman "This just in... he's Good!"

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – A chain reaction is likely to result in something that is at once an advantage and a disadvantage. How you react will make all the difference.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Avoid those people who are working against you. There is no reason for you to make things harder for yourself – even in social situations.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – The questions you're asking at this time are not likely to be answered by any one person today. You'll have to collect information piece-meal.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Things are sure to pick up after midday, when a chance encounter has you re-evaluating your current plans. Trust your instincts to see you through.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – This is a good day to push yourself a little further in order to maximize your own rewards. When the time comes, share gains with others.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You'll be following in a friend's footsteps throughout much of the day, but there will come a time when he or she asks you to take the lead.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll want to stay close to home today, as someone you are very close to is on the threshold of a major personal development.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Concentrate on consolidating your efforts and making things urn more smoothly at the workplace. Efficiency is the key, after all.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – It's no mystery what has been sapping your energy lately; you've been taking on too many odd jobs that have proven to be distracting.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Use great care today when your emotions come to life. It's essential that you employ self-control, patience, and a hefty dose of tolerance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – What you do to help those less fortunate than yourself will be noticed by someone who may be able to offer you a new and important opportunity.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You'll be asked to defend yourself today, and when you turn to someone you trust for backup you may find that he or she is gone – temporarily.

Quote of the Day

"How far must you go to gain respect? Umm, well it's kind of simple: just remain your own, or you'll be crazy sad and alone."

How quickly things can change. Outscoring St. Bonaventure and Duquesne by a combined 30-3 margin, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, which had struggled against tough non-conference competition finding its record at 2-5 after the opening stretch, began its Atlantic 10 schedule with a bang.

Used to taking on high-ly ranked opponents, such as Syracuse, Dartmouth and Cornell, the Minutewomen (4-5 overall, 2-0 Atlantic 10) wasted no time jumping on top of the inexperienced Bonnies on Friday in Olean, NY. UMass exploded out of the gates on an 8-0 run, and never looked back, leading 11-2 at the break. St. Bonaventure (0-5, 0-1) continued in its harsh attempt to field a Division I women's lacrosse team, an experiment that has begun with five straight blowout losses.

In the 14-2 route, 18 Minutewomen managed to score a point, with an unprecedented five hitting the back of the net twice. Rachel Ingraffea, Melissa Miele, Stephanie Pavlick, Sara MacNabb and freshman phenom Kelli Kurtz all tickled the twine two times.

"It gives our attack balance," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "On the days that we're clicking, anyone is a dangerous player out there, and it's really to our benefit out there. You can't mark everybody out of a game with a group like that."

Also among the snipers were some unlikely scorers, such as seniors Jessica Passanese and Lynne Young, who rarely deviate from the defensive side of the field.

"[Jessica] was very excited about scoring her first collegiate goal," Barnes said.

On that defensive side of the field, the Maroon and White were nearly as dominating. The outmatched Bonnie squad could only get the ball past junior Minutewoman goalie Jen Nardi twice.

UMass	18
St. Bonaventure	2

That output, however tiny, though, doubled what Sunday's opponent, Duquesne could muster, as UMass cruised by the potent Dukes, 11-1.

With an 11-6 1999 campaign in their rearview, Duquesne returned the nation's seventh leading scorer in Meghan Hurgate, as well as the rest of its 12-player starting lineup from a year ago. Five of those returning had tallied at least 23 goals each last season, making a one-point showing on their homefield in Pittsburgh, PA, quite a defensive feat by the traveling Minutewomen.

Still, among the Dukes' 4-1 record heading into the weekend were Drexel, Davidson and Bucknell, a far cry from the power-packed slate that UMass honed its skills against. Barnes' reasoning for beginning the schedule with the cast of superstars that he did became painfully clear to Duquesne, who couldn't compete with the high level of play that the Minutewomen had become accustomed to against teams like the Orangewomen and Big Green.

"I think playing the stronger schedule definitely prepared us for the A-10 and the upcoming games," Barnes said. "Our next three games are huge A-10 games, with Virginia Tech, St. Joe's and Temple, in that order."

Just two and a half minutes into the contest, Ingraffea showed what she had learned in the Initial month's competition, beating Duke netminder Becky Stauffer to open the floodgates with a 1-0 UMass lead.

With only another 2:30 having ticked away, junior Fay Naber tacked on another, but the landslide did not get completely underway until Miele bettered Stauffer with 8:36 showing on the clock.

Over the course of approximately the next nine minutes, UMass scored another four times to take a halftime lead of 7-0. Kurtz hit the Red and Blue net at the 6:20 mark, and Ingraffea followed suite with an assist by Naber with 3:11 to go before the break.

Just 16 seconds later, senior co-captain Rebecca Minaker notched a goal, and with nine ticks on the scoreboard, Pavlick put the nail in the Duquesne coffin while the game was still awaiting middle age.

Minaker grabbed her second goal just under ten minutes into the second half, and when junior Denise Brey and MacNabb each notched one at close to the 16 and 15 minute marks, respectively, the game was already out of hand.

Duke attack Kris Harmer was responsible for spoiling Nardi's shutout at the 12:51 mark, but Young again wandered over to the offensive side of the field to retaliate to finish the scoring at 11-1.

The 2-0 A-10 start gives the Minutewomen conference momentum heading into Friday's game against league-rival Virginia Tech, who is responsible for the Maroon and White's first round exit from 1999's inaugural A-10 lacrosse tournament.

"It's not about the wins and losses, its about competing and going out," Barnes said. "Our team is really maturing and stepping up now, they're learning how to be the go-to players."

Baker's dozen unlucky for Minutemen as Hokies blank Maroon and White

By Matthew Despres

Consider it the calm after the storm.

After a flurry of hits rained down on a wind swept Earl Lorden Field Saturday afternoon, both the sky and offense dried up for the Minutemen on Monday, as the Massachusetts baseball team collected only three hits all afternoon and lost to Virginia Tech, 13-0. After putting up a healthy 15 runs in the nightcap of Saturday's doubleheader, head coach Mike Stone addressed his team's sudden drop-off after the game.

"There was no mystery today, they just stuffed us," said Stone. "They came out swinging, and we didn't play much defense, couldn't get anybody out. We just got smoked. We didn't compete."

The Hokies (21-13-2 overall, 7-2 Atlantic 10) wasted no time in digging the Minutemen an early hole to climb in to. Senior Chad Foutz got the ball rolling with a single to center to lead off the first inning. With Foutz at first, freshmen Brad Baudet stepped up and blasted a homerun over the centerfield fence off of UMass starter Jesse Santos to put Virginia Tech up 2-0. After a led English single, freshman Marc Tugwell ripped a double down the third base line, through the legs of third baseman John Seed that advanced English to third. With two in scoring position, sophomore Chris Winterfeldt singled to center, scoring English and Tugwell to push the Hokie lead to 4-0. Santos escaped the inning when senior Gray Hodges hit into a double play to bring down the side.

After the Minutemen went down 1-2-3 in the bottom of the first, the Hokies rolled in the top of the second. Freshman Spencer Harris led off the inning with a single to left field. Foutz sent him home moments later when he hit a two-run shot over the right field fence that gave Virginia Tech a 6-0 advantage. After walking Tugwell five batters later, Santos was pulled in favor of junior Nick Skirkanich, who promptly struck out the first batter he faced to get out of the inning. Santos left after pitching two plus innings, allowing nine hits and walking two.

Although he inherited both a 6-0 deficit and a lackluster effort from his team, Skirkanich performed admirably in his stint during the middle innings. In his first full inning of work he retired the side, striking out two along the way. He picked his pitches well and although he didn't stop the bleeding entirely, allowing two runs in the fourth inning, he certainly slowed it. Stone cut his day short, however, removing the pitcher after 79 pitches.

"It was pretty obvious that we weren't competing well enough to give us a chance to win the ball game," said Stone. "I don't want to burn him out for the rest of the week because he's our closer. He's got the best stuff coming out of the bullpen. I wanted to make sure we saved him for Thursday in relief."

Virginia Tech head coach Chuck Hartman had no such problem on Monday afternoon. His starter, freshman Joe Saunders, cruised in a superb three-hit, nine inning effort. Saunders, who was a fifth-round draft choice of the Philadelphia Phillies but opted for Virginia Tech, displayed

UMass track squads run on

Men battle strong winds, regional rivals

By Adam De Young

This past weekend, like Bob Seger, the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team, was running "Against the Wind."

UMass traveled to Storrs, CT for what was expected to be a tough meet against four other quality squads. They faced the likes of the Connecticut, Rhode Island, Central Connecticut State and Boston College.

"I figured that UConn would be the clear cut winner," said head coach of the Minutemen Ken O'Brien, "(they) were the number two ranked indoor team."

The Huskies reigned supreme In the five-team meet with a commanding 161-point performance while URI edged the Minutemen by a nose with 91 points on the final board. The Maroon and White finished third with 89 on the afternoon.

"It's always dissappointing to lose to URI," O'Brien said, "You would like to win them all, but this was not a major catastrophe."

UMass had some very strong outings in many of the events on the day. Freshman long jumper Tony Ortega turned in the surprise performance on the day jumping for a career best of 22'1.5".

Coach O'Brien was very pleased with the tremendous results of Ortega's leap, "that was a surprise win, a pleasant surprise."

The Minutemen had three other first place finishers on the day including, senior Ben Baraldi who picked up first in the 110-meter hurdles with a time of 14.76 seconds. Junior Brendan Sullivan took home the first place prize in the steeplechase, finishing in an astounding 9:18. Not to be outdone was sophomore Kevin Curtin won the 3,000-meter run in 8:54.

UMass was aided by a host of others who had strong showings at the meet. The Maroon and White took third place in three different events, including Mike Harris in the 100-meter dash, Cutlin in the 1500-meter, and Marc Sylvandler in the 400-meter.

Two fourth place finishers of note, were Steffan Russ also in the 100-meter dash and Sean Murphy in the 1500-meter. Chad Schwarz and Jesse Austin threw for 145 and 142 feet respectively in an event that O'Brien called "a very good javelin field" having very respectable outings.

Massachusetts will next be in action next in Providence, RI for a quad-meet this Saturday, which includes Brown, Northeastern and Southern Connecticut.

Minutewomen bright in season opener

By Regan McKendry

The weather forecast for April 8 predicted another gorgeous day, thus echoing the arrival of yet another spring season. Eager to enjoy it was the Massachusetts women's outdoor track team. The Minutewomen traveled two hours east to the land of lumbos to participate in the 2000 Tufts Invitational.

Unfortunately results from this meet were unavailable at press time.

However, with the joys of spring in the air, it is fitting to recap of the stellar action that has occurred thus far for the Maroon and White. In their only other meet in the spring campaign the Minutewomen traveled to the Granite State where they competed in a five-team meet that included Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine and the host Dartmouth.

Yellow was the color of the day on this afternoon for seniors Alison Tostevin and Sharon Tillotson.

Tostevin set a personal best in the shot put with a heave of 41'11.25". This was also good enough for fourth place on the all-time charts here at UMass. Trailing Tostevin with strong throws were freshman Maggie Curry and junior Carole LaPlante, posting distances of 38'7.75" and 38'4.25", respectively.

Not to be out done was Tillotson, who earned a third place finish in the 3000-meter race, breaking the tape at a time of 10:18.54. Fellow senior Elizabeth Sheptsyk finished just behind in a time of 10:50.88.

At the other end of the distance spectrum, was a second place finish for Kate Toye in the 100-meter dash. Toye's time of 12.47 was good enough to earn herself the red-ribbon. Senior Jamie Hedgecock trailed close behind her sophomore teammate with a time of 12.57.

Leaping through an equivalent distance as her teammates Toye and Hedgecock, junior Chrystal Murphy brought a red-ribbon to herself with a finish of 14.80. Sophomore Lea Dwyer followed her up with a time of 16.15.

On the day when spring first blossomed for the residents of New England, the sun shined on the freshman Curry. In the first meet of her UMass career, the new Minutewoman finished with a discus throw of 135'7.5". Not only was this good enough for fifth place at the meet, but it earned the newcomer a standing of third all-time in the UMass record books.

The Minutewomen will next be in action Saturday when they travel to Providence for a quad-meet with Brown, Northeastern and Southern Connecticut.

Women make a sudden racket

With one swing of the racket, the Massachusetts women's tennis team has now won two matches in a row for the first time since late October improving to 3-8 in the spring season (6-13 overall), by defeating Atlantic 10 foe Fordham 6-3.

The 6-3 victory may seem convincing to some, but looking at it more closely shows that two of the six victories were by default. The victories came via forfeit in the No. 6 singles and No. 3 double matches.

More specifically the Minutewomen needed a valiant effort from the middle seeds to secure another win and they got it.

After rough start, softball regaining its form; Scarlet Knights next in line for Minutewomen

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Temperatures in the 30's, icy wind and snow can all be expected this afternoon in the town of Amherst.

Luckily the Massachusetts softball team is playing in New Brunswick, New Jersey today, and if the weather report is correct, will have the luxury of playing under mainly sunny skies and 55-degree heat. This is especially good news for the six Californian players and two Arizonians that came across the country to suit up for the Maroon and White, and are probably not used to hitting and fielding the ball in weather anyone this side of Alaska would consider cold.

The doubleheader will begin at 2:00 p.m., when the Minutewomen take the field at the Rutgers Softball Complex and try and improve their 15-18, (1-1 A10) record against the Scarlet Knights. It is another tough out-of-conference game for a team that has already matched up against the likes of such powerhouses as Arizona State, Oklahoma, Stanford and Illinois-Chicago, among others.

Despite the schedule, UMass has been riding a hot streak of late that has helped the Minutewomen dig out of the 0-8 hole they put themselves in at the beginning of the season. A very young group of freshmen and sophomores has sparked the team, and has shown the country that UMass will be a team to reckon with well into the future.

Two freshmen, pitcher Kaila Holtz and first baseman Brandi Cross, have been the main reasons that the Minutewomen have risen from the depths of obscurity. Holtz has displayed both a great fasthall and a dazzling changeup in her last few starts, as well as pinpoint control and an ability to strike out opposing hitters. She has won her last four starts, pitching shutouts in two of them. Against Virginia Tech on April 8 she struck out seven and got the win, and against Central Connecticut a few days earlier she K'd 10 and shut out the Blue Devils. On April 2 she pitched probably her best game of the season by throwing a one-hitter against Syracuse.

While Holtz has dominated on the mound, Cross has done equally as well at the plate. She leads the team in almost every offensive category, including an almost unheard of .396 batting average. Her three home runs, 23 RBI, 40 hits and .594 slugging percentage are also best

Vanin suspends five UMass students

Quintet suspected in Feb. 25 raping of 15-year-old girl

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Press Office issued a news release yesterday, announcing that Jo-Anne Vanin, Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, has suspended five students facing court charges for their involvement with two separate incidents on UMass campus, pending disciplinary actions. All five of the suspensions will be effective immediately.

Although the students have not had a disciplinary hearing, the University's code of conduct allows the Dean of Students to impose such restrictions without prior notice.

According to the press release, "whenever there is ground to believe that the student is an imminent threat to himself or herself, to others, or to property, or the cause of serious disruption to the University community," then University is allowed to suspend them prior to a disciplinary hearing. The judicial process allows students to meet with University officials and discuss the charges and a hearing if necessary.

The students who have been suspended are John M. Moran, age 20, of Arlington, and Jared T. Bruun, age 21, of Acton. Both have been charged in connection with the disturbance and subsequent fire in Southwest during the power outage last Saturday morning, April 8. Joaquim A. Alves, age 21, and Renato A. Brandao, age 23, both of Dorchester, and Roberto B. Andrade, age 25, of Brockton, are also being suspended.

Alves, Brandao and Andrade are currently awaiting a court trial after being indicted by a Hampshire Grand Jury on March 14 for charges of allegedly raping a 15-year-old girl last February. The victim has told police that at around 11 p.m. on Feb. 25 while at a party she met four men, one of whom she knew as a student teacher at Amherst Regional High School. At midnight, she left the party with them and went to a UMass dormitory room where she was sexually assaulted. At 1 a.m. she and the four left the dorm, met two other men in a parking lot, and all six got into one man's car. Four of the men got out at Amherst College and she continued with two of them to an apartment in Colonial Village. There she was allegedly forced to have sex on sofa with one of the men, even though she told him her age.

Bruun and Moran are being suspended for their part in last weekend's disturbance in Southwest. Bruun and Moran were both arrested early Saturday morning during a power outage that affected all of UMass campus and much of the surrounding area. A large group of students gathered outside in the Southwest Mall and set a desk and furniture on fire. Bruun was charged with disorderly conduct and inciting a riot or crowd. Moran was charged with disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and burning personal property valued over $25.

The press release quoted Chancellor David K. Scott promising to take a strong position on reckless and disruptive behavior. "We will not tolerate the behavior of a few disruptive types and we are taking the strongest action possible under the law and the code of student conduct," Scott said.

According to the press release, Scott is ordering the installation of video cameras in the Southwest area. The cameras will be located both outside and in the entryways to buildings. Scott said, "the time has come for cameras to ensure the safety of the vast majority of our students who find this kind of behavior abhorrent."

The press release also says that Scott has asked the Dean of Students Office to look into holding groups of students responsible for costs when University property

Scott proposes security cameras for Southwest

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's administration reacted yesterday to Chancellor Scott's announcement that security cameras would be placed in Southwest.

Jeff Howe, the SGA President, said that Scott's proposal "flies in the face of what we've been trying to work on."

Howe had been alerted that morning that the Chancellor planned to install cameras in Southwest, but didn't have details of when or where they would be placed. He said that the original message stated that the cameras would monitor outdoor areas, but felt that Scott had increased the cameras scope to include lobbies and hallways.

"I just hope that isn't the case," Howe said.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian described the measures as "reactionary."

"It shows no concern for the opinion of students, and I really don't believe it will serve the purpose he intends it to. There is limited funding, poorly paid security guards, un-staffed buildings, but for some bizarre reason," Avakian said. "The Chancellor believes security cameras are a good idea."

Mikale Billard, the Speaker of the SGA Senate was "shocked that the decision came out the way it did" late Tuesday evening. He said that he had a chance to speak with the Chancellor.

"We hadn't heard anything about it. The Chancellor didn't mention anything to us tonight [during the Safety Walk]. He only asked us for his support," Billard said. Although nothing had been formally submitted to the SGA for tonight's meeting, Billard guessed "something, of some form, would be said."

The only explanation that Howe, who made security cameras one of his major campaign issues, had heard was that their installment was "related to fires and the riot

Safety walk inspects campus

Despite poor weather conditions the semi-annual safety walk drew a moderate crowd last night to evaluate the condition of campus, many noting that things are better than past years.

"Things have improved a lot. Every six months I go on this walk and things seem to get progressively better each time," said Richard Kula, a Physical Plant employee.

Individuals on the walk, which included members of the administration, Chancellor David K. Scott, physical plant employers, students and representatives from the Student Government Association, split into five sub-groups covering the entire campus.

Each group accessed the conditions of the paths, in addition to pointing out where lighting needed to be added or bulbs changed, where shrubs could use trimming and checked all call boxes to assure they were working properly.

Most of the smaller improvements noted, in particular the fixing of already existing lights, could be made within the next week, according to Kula.

More expensive suggestions would be brought to the Summit on Safety where they will be prioritized and completed as the budget allowed. As Ken Campbell, Chair of the Safety Committee and SGA Senator said, what gets done and in what order depends on the funding that is allotted.

The group commented that a new call box will be put in place this summer as a result of a past recommendation. "One of the top recommendations for call boxes [is] by the Southwest tunnel [which] will go in this summer," Teixera said.

One suggestion that would be passed onto the committee from last night's portion of the walk, including the main academic buildings, was to put lights under the bus stops, said Deputy Chief Officer Larry Holmes.

Chancellor David K. Scott said this was his first time walking on the safety walk, but that he had walked around the campus last November during the time of the assaults and had found some areas, especially near what is commonly known as the 'Rape Trial' "scary."

He said he felt the safety walk was a positive way to determine where different unsafe areas on campus were and to work toward increasing safety on campus.

"There's always room for improvement," Campbell said. He said the walk each semester brings to light many things that could otherwise go unnoticed, making a suggestion on the walk for a possible spotlight on the backside of Goodell.

"I felt the walk was very successful," Campbell said. "It was a good group of people that turned out, especially considering the weather and we found a lot of things that will hope to be fixed in the next couple of years."

Spring Concert slated for May 7

By Ryan Benharris

The 2000 Spring Concert will take place at the Mullins Center on Sunday, May 7. University Productions and Concerts (UPC) along with the Student Government Association announced yesterday that the headlining acts for the performance will be Def Jam Artists' Method Man and Redman. Other acts that will be included are Long Beach Dub All-stars and Beenie Man. There will also be a second stage that will include rapper Tuzzbubble, as well as the winner of the "Southwest Battle of the Bands." Biz Markie will be the Master of Ceremonies for the entire show.

Besides the concert, the event boasts several other activities including, a carnival from 12-4 p.m. that will showcase dunk tanks, Velcro walls, and other activities. The concert will start at 4:30 p.m.

Method Man and Redman have been touring together for the past few months after the release of the album, Blackout! The stop at the Mullins Center is only one of their many University performances, which include the University of Maine, the University of Pennsylvania and Cornell University. The two will bring a high profile act that will surely excite the UMass crowd.

In an interview with Def Jam records, Redman said, "Hip-hop has been good to us. We never want to go away. Hip-hop is back to the hardcore." Blackout! is not the first time that the two rappers collaborated. They

Leaping from playgrounds to primates

By Jason Trenkle

Senior biology major Tess Griffin spends her day like most University of Massachusetts students: studying, going to class, socializing and spending her afternoon performing research in a primate lab. Still, unlike most students, Griffin is one of the youngest students to graduate from UMass at the age of 17.

Griffin said there is nothing special in what she did. Her decision to skip eighth through twelfth grade and enter college at the age of 13-years-old was a decision that she said "felt just right."

"I've been wanting to go to college ever since I was 11 and I think a lot of it has to do with my father," Griffin said. "He went back to school when he was older so I had him as a role model. A lot of it was me wanting to go to college and he knew I could take that step and I knew I could do it too."

For most students, the leap from high school to college is a big step, but Griffin said amidst all the pressure that existed for her to achieve a high school diploma, she came to UMass without one.

"I was going to go from seventh to ninth grade and I was going to do that so I could do dual enrollment and go to high school and college at the same time," Griffin said. "But they didn't want to put me through that. It involved a lot of expensive tests and we didn't have the money to go through that, so we went over here (UMass)."

There were more than a few obstacles standing in Griffin's path when she first applied to UMass. Having received no high school diploma and having not taken the SATs, she said the university was reluctant in recognizing her status as a full-time student until she had taken her SAT's and fulfilled high school credits. However, at age 15, she wasn't old enough to take the standardized test and the university would only allow her to take classes through continuing education.

It was then that her father, Robert Griffin, a management professor at UMass, appealed to the university to allow his daughter to enroll as a special student.

"She wasn't being challenged in junior high and then she came up with the idea that she could go to college," Professor Griffin said. "I teach college-level classes and I thought that she might just be able to do it."

Conference foes no match for UMass women's lacrosse

Balanced scoring paces Minutewomen in victories

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

How quickly things can change. Outscoring St. Bonaventure and Duquesne by a combined 30-3 margin, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, which had struggled against tough non-conference competition finding its record at 2-3 after the opening stretch, began its Atlantic 10 schedule with a bang.

Used to taking on high-ranked opponents, such as Syracuse, Dartmouth and Cornell, the Minutewomen (4-3 overall, 2-0 Atlantic 10) wasted no time jumping on top of the inexperienced Bonnies on Friday in Olean, NY. UMass exploded out of the gates on an 8-0 run, and never looked back, leading 11-2 at the break. St. Bonaventure (0-3, 0-1) continued in its harsh attempt to field a Division I women's lacrosse team, an experiment that has begun with five straight blowout losses.

In the 19-2 route, 18 Minutewomen managed to score a point, with an unprecedented five hitting the back of the net twice. Rachel Ingraffea, Melissa Miele, Stephanie Pavlick, Sara MacNabb and freshman phenom Kelli Kurtz all tickled the twine two times.

"It gives our attack balance," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "On the days that we're clicking, anyone is a dangerous player out there, and it's really to our benefit out there. You can't mark everybody out of a game with a group like that."

Also among the snipers were some unlikely scorers, such as seniors Jessica Passanese and Lynne Young, who rarely deviate from the defensive side of the field.

"[Jessica] was very excited about scoring her first collegiate goal," Barnes said.

On that defensive side of the field, the Maroon and White were nearly as dominating. The outmatched Bonnie squad could only get the ball past junior Minutewoman goalie Jen Nardi twice.

That output, however tiny, though, doubled what Sunday's opponent, Duquesne could muster, as UMass cruised by the potent Dukes, 11-1.

With an 11-6 1999 campaign in their rearview, Duquesne returned the nation's seventh leading scorer in Meghan Hungate, as well as the rest of its 12-player starting lineup from a year ago. Five of those returning had tallied at least 25 goals each last season, making a one-point showing on their homefield in Pittsburgh, PA, quite a defensive feat by the traveling Minutewomen.

Still, among the Dukes' 4-1 record heading into the weekend were Drexel, Davidson and Bucknell, a far cry from the power-packed slate that UMass honed its skills against. Barnes' reasoning for beginning the schedule with the cast of superstars that he did became painfully clear to Duquesne, who couldn't compete with the high level of play that the Minutewomen had become accustomed to against teams like the Orangewomen and Big Green.

"I think playing the stronger schedule definitely prepared us for the A-10 and the upcoming games," Barnes said. "Our next three games are huge A-10 games, with Virginia Tech, St. Joe's and Temple, in that order."

Just two and a half minutes into the contest, Ingraffea showed what she had learned in the initial month's competition, beating Duke netminder Becky Stauffer to open the floodgates with a 1-0 UMass lead.

With only another 2:30 having ticked away, junior Fay Naber tacked on another, but the landslide did not get completely underway until Miele bettered Stauffer with 8:06 showing on the clock.

Over the course of approximately the next nine minutes, UMass scored another four times to take a halftime lead of 7-0. Kurtz hit the Red and Blue net at the 6:20 mark, and Ingraffea followed suite with an assist by Naber with 3:11 to go before the break.

Just 16 seconds later, senior co-captain Rebecca Minaker notched a goal, and with nine ticks on the scoreboard, Pavlick put the nail in the Duquesne coffin while the game was still awaiting middle age.

Minaker grabbed her second goal just under ten minutes into the second half, and when junior Denise Brey and MacNabb each notched one at close to the 16 and 15 minute marks, respectively, the game was already out of hand.

Duke attack Kris Harner was responsible for spoiling Nardi's shutout at the 12:51 mark, but Young again wandered over to the offensive side of the field to retaliate to finish the scoring at 11-1.

The 2-0 A-10 start gives the Minutewomen conference momentum heading into Friday's game against league-rival Virginia Tech, who is responsible for the Maroon and White's first round exit from 1999's inaugural A-10 lacrosse tournament.

"It's not about the wins and losses, its about competing and going out," Barnes said. "Our team is really maturing and stepping up now, they're learning how to be the go-to players."

Baker's dozen unlucky for Minutemen as Hokies blank Maroon and White

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Consider it the calm after the storm.

After a flurry of hits rained down on a wind swept Earl Lorden Field Saturday afternoon, both the sky and offense dried up for the Minutemen on Monday, as the Massachusetts baseball team collected only three hits all afternoon and lost to Virginia Tech, 13-0. After putting up a healthy 15 runs in the nightcap of Saturday's doubleheader, head coach Mike Stone addressed his team's sudden drop-off after the game.

"There was no mystery today, they just stuffed us," said Stone. "They came out swinging, and we didn't play much defense, couldn't get anybody out. We just got smoked. We didn't compete."

The Hokies (21-13-2 overall, 7-2 Atlantic 10) wasted no time in digging the Minutemen an early hole to climb in to. Senior Chad Foutz got the ball rolling with a single to center to lead off the first inning. With Foutz at first, freshmen Brad Bauder stepped up and blasted a homerun over the centerfield fence off of UMass starter Jesse Santos to put Virginia Tech up 2-0. After a led English single, freshman Marc Tugwell ripped a double down the third base line, through the legs of third basemen John Seed that advanced English to third. With two in scoring position, sophomore Chris Winterfeldt singled to center, scoring English and Tugwell to push the Hokie lead to 4-0. Santos escaped the inning when senior Gray Hodges hit into a double play to bring down the side.

After the Minutemen went down 1-2-3 in the bottom of the first, the Hokies rolled in the top of the second. Freshman Spencer Harris led off the inning with a single to left field. Foutz sent him home moments later when he hit a two-run shot over the right field fence that gave Virginia Tech a 6-0 advantage. After walking Tugwell five batters later, Santos was pulled in favor of junior Nick Skirkanich, who promptly struck out the first batter he faced to get out of the inning. Santos left after pitching two plus innings, allowing nine hits and walking two.

Although he inherited both a 6-0 deficit and a lackluster effort from his team, Skirkanich performed admirably in his work he retired the side, striking out two along the way. He picked his pitches well and although he didn't stop the bleeding entirely, allowing two runs in the fourth inning, he certainly slowed it. Stone cut his day short, however, removing the pitcher after 79 pitches.

"It was pretty obvious that we weren't competing well enough to give us a chance to win the ball game," said Stone. "I don't want to burn him out for the rest of the week because he's our closer. He's got the best stuff coming out of the bullpen. I wanted to make sure we saved him for Thursday in relief."

Virginia Tech head coach Chuck Hartman had no such problem on Monday afternoon. His starter, freshman Joe Saunders, cruised in a superb three-hit, nine inning effort. Saunders, who was a fifth-round draft choice of the Philadelphia Phillies but opted for Virginia Tech, displayed

Men battle strong winds, regional rivals

By Adam De Young

This past weekend, like Bob Seger, the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team, was running "Against the Wind."

UMass traveled to Storrs, CT for what was expected to be a tough meet against four other quality squads. They faced the likes of the Connecticut, Rhode Island, Central Connecticut State and Boston College.

"I figured that UConn would be the clear cut winner," said head coach of the Minutemen Ken O'Brien, "(they) were the number two ranked indoor team."

The Huskies reigned supreme in the five-team meet with a commanding 161-point performance while URI edged the Minutemen by a nose with 91 points on the final board. The Maroon and White finished third with 89 on the afternoon.

"It's always dissappointing to lose to URI," O'Brien said, "You would like to win them all, but this was not a major catastrophe."

UMass had some very strong outings in many of the events on the day. Freshman long jumper Tony Ortega turned in the surprise performance on the day jumping for a career best of 22'1.5".

Coach O'Brien was very pleased with the tremendous results of Ortega's leap, "that was a surprise sem, a pleasant surprise."

The Minutemen had three other first place finishers on the day including, senior Ben Baraldi who picked up first in the 110-meter hurdles with a time of 14.76 seconds. Junior Brendan Sullivan took home the first place prize in the steeplechase, finishing in an astounding 9:19. Not to be outdone was sophomore Kevin Curtin won the 3,000-meter run in 8:54.

UMass was aided by a host of others who had strong showings at the meet. The Maroon and White took third place in three different events, including Mike Hartle in the 100-meter dash, Curtin in the 1,500-meter, and Marc Sylvandier in the 400-meter.

Two fourth place finishers of note, were Steffan Russ also in the 100-meter dash and Sean Murphy in the 1,500-meter. Chad Schwarz and Jesse Austin threw for 194' and 192-feet respectively in an event that O'Brien called "a very good javelin field" having very respectable outings.

Massachusetts will next be in action next in Providence, RI for a quad-meet this Saturday, which includes Brown, Northeastern and Southern Connecticut.

Minutewomen bright in season opener

By Regan McKendry
Collegian Correspondent

The weather forecast for April 8 predicted another gorgeous day, thus echoing the arrival of yet another spring season. Eager to enjoy it was the Massachusetts women's outdoor track team. The Minutewomen traveled two hours east to the land of lumbos to participate in the 2000 Tufts Invitational.

Unfortunately results from this meet were unavailable at press time.

However, with the joys of spring in the air, it is fitting to recap of the stellar action that has occurred thus far for the Maroon and White. In their only other meet in the spring campaign the Minutewomen traveled to the Granite State where they competed in a five-team meet that included Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine and the host Dartmouth.

Yellow was the color of the day on this afternoon for seniors Alison Tostevin and Sharon Tillotson.

Tostevin set a personal best in the shot put with a heave of 41'11.25". This was also good enough for fourth place on the all-time charts here at UMass. Trailing Tostevin with strong throws were freshman Maggie Curry and junior Carole LaPlante, posting distances of 38'7.75" and 38'4.25", respectively.

Not to be out done was Tillotson, who earned a third place finish in the 3000-meter race, breaking the tape at a time of 10:18.54. Fellow senior Elizabeth Sheptyck finished just behind in a time of 10:50.88.

At the other end of the distance spectrum, was a second place finish for Kate Toye in the 100-meter dash. Toye's time of 12.47 was good enough to earn herself the red ribbon. Senior Jamie Hedgecock trailed close behind her sophomore teammate with a time of 12.57.

Leaping through an equivalent distance as her teammates Toye and Hedgecock, junior Chrystal Murphy brought a red ribbon to herself with a finish of 14-80. Sophomore Lea Dwyer followed her up with a time of 16-15.

On the day when spring first blossomed for the residents of New England, the sun shined on the freshman Curry. In the first meet of her UMass career, the new Minutewoman finished with a discus throw of 135'7.5". Not only was this good enough for fifth place at the meet, but it earned the newcomer a standing of third all-time in the UMass record books.

The Minutewomen will next be in action Saturday when they travel to Providence for a quad-meet with Brown, Northeastern and Southern Connecticut.

After rough start, softball regaining its form; Scarlet Knights next in line for Minutewomen

By Jesse Greenspon
Collegian Staff

Temperatures in the 30's, icy wind and snow can all be expected this afternoon in the town of Amherst.

Luckily the Massachusetts softball team is playing in New Brunswick, New Jersey today, and if the weather report is correct, will have the luxury of playing under mainly sunny skies and 55-degree heat. This is especially good news for the six Californian players and two Arizonians that came across the country to suit up for the Maroon and White, and are probably not used to hitting and fielding the ball in weather anyone this side of Alaska would consider cold.

The doubleheader will begin at 2:00 p.m., when the Minutewomen take the field at the Rutgers Softball Complex and try and improve their 15-18, (1-1 A10) record against the Scarlet Knights. It is another tough out-of-conference game for a team that has already marched up against the likes of such powerhouses as Arizona State, Oklahoma, Stanford and Illinois-Chicago, among others.

Despite the schedule, UMass has been riding a hot streak of late that has helped the Minutewomen dig out of the 0-8 hole they put themselves in at the beginning of the season. A very young group of freshmen and sophomores has sparked the team, and has shown the country that UMass will be a team to reckon with well into the future.

Two freshmen, pitcher Kaila Holtz and first baseman Brandi Cross, have been the main reasons that the Minutewomen have risen from the depths of obscurity. Holtz has displayed both a great fastball and a dazzling changeup in her last few starts, as well as pinpoint control and an ability to strike out opposing hitters. She has won her last four starts, pitching shutouts in two of them. Against Virginia Tech on April 8 she struck out seven and got the win, and against Central Connecticut a few days earlier she K'd 10 and shut out the Blue Devils. On April 2 she pitched probably her best game of the season by throwing a one-hitter against Syracuse.

While Holtz has dominated on the mound, Cross has done equally as well at the plate. She leads the team in almost every offensive category, including an almost unheard of .396 batting average. Her three home runs, 23 RBI, 40 hits and .594 slugging percentage are also best

With one swing of the racket, the Massachusetts women's tennis team has now won two matches in a row for the first time since late October improving to 3-8 in the spring season (6-13 overall), by defeating Atlantic 10 foe Fordham 6-3.

The 6-3 victory may seem convincing to some, but looking at it more closely shows that two of the six victories were by default. The victories came via forfeit in the No. 6 singles and No. 3 double matches.

More specifically the Minutewomen needed a valiant effort from the middle seeds to secure another win and they got it.

Vanin suspends five UMass students

Quintet suspected in Feb. 25 raping of 15-year-old girl

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Press Office issued a news release yesterday, announcing that Jo-Anne Vanin, Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, has suspended five students facing court charges for their involvement with two separate incidents on UMass campus, pending disciplinary actions. All five of the suspensions will be effective immediately.

Although the students have not had a disciplinary hearing, the University's code of conduct allows the Dean of Students to impose such restrictions without prior notice.

According to the press release, "whenever there is ground to believe that the student is an imminent threat to himself or herself, to others, or to property, or the cause of serious disruption to the University community," then University is allowed to suspend them prior to a disciplinary hearing. The judicial process allows students to meet with University officials and discuss the charges and a hearing if necessary.

The students who have been suspended are John M. Moran, age 20, of Arlington, and Jared T. Brunn, age 21, of Acton. Both have been charged in connection with the disturbance and subsequent fire in Southwest during the power outage last Saturday morning, April 8. Joaquim A. Alves, age 21, and Renato A. Brandao, age 23, both of Dorchester, and Roberto B. Andrade, age 25, of Brockton, are also being suspended.

Alves, Brandao and Andrade are currently awaiting a court trial after being indicted by a Hampshire Grand Jury on March 14 for charges of allegedly raping a 15-year-old girl last February. The victim has told police that at around 11 p.m. on Feb. 25 while at a party she met four men, one of whom she knew as a student teacher at Amherst Regional High School. At midnight, she left the party with them and went to a UMass dormitory room where she was sexually assaulted. At 1 a.m. she and the four left the dorm, met two other men in a parking lot, and all six got into one man's car. Four of the men got out at Amherst College and she continued with two of them to an apartment in Colonial Village. There she was allegedly forced to have sex on a sofa with one of the men, even though she told him her age.

Brunn and Moran are being suspended for their part in last weekend's disturbance in Southwest. Brunn and Moran were both arrested early Saturday morning during a power outage that affected all of UMass campus and much of the surrounding area. A large group of students gathered outside in the Southwest Mall and set a desk and furniture on fire. Brunn was charged with disorderly conduct and inciting a riot or crowd. Moran was charged with disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and burning personal property valued over $250.

The press release quoted Chancellor David K. Scott promising to take a strong position on reckless and disruptive behavior. "We will not tolerate the behavior of a few disruptive types and we are taking the strongest action possible under the law and the code of student conduct," Scott said.

According to the press release, Scott is ordering the installation of video cameras in the Southwest area. The cameras will be located both outside and in the entryways to buildings. Scott said, "the time has come for cameras to ensure the safety of the vast majority of our students who find this kind of behavior abhorrent."

The press release also says that Scott has asked the Dean of Students Office to look into holding groups of students responsible for costs when University property

Scott proposes security cameras for Southwest

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's administration reacted yesterday to Chancellor Scott's announcement that security cameras would be placed in Southwest.

Jeff Howe, the SGA President, said that Scott's proposal "flies in the face of what we've been trying to work on."

Howe had been alerted that morning that the Chancellor planned to install cameras in Southwest, but didn't have details of when or where they would be placed. He said that the original message stated that the cameras would monitor outdoor areas, but felt that Scott had increased the cameras scope to include lobbies and hallways.

"I just hope that isn't the case," Howe said.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian described the measures as "reactionary."

"It shows no concern for the opinion of students, and I really don't believe it will serve its purpose he intends it to. There is limited funding, poorly paid security guards, un-staffed buildings, but for some bizarre reason," Avakian said, "the Chancellor believes security cameras are a good idea."

Mikale Billard, the Speaker of the SGA Senate, was "shocked that the decision came out the way it did." Late Tuesday evening, he said that he had a chance to speak with the Chancellor.

"We hadn't heard anything about it. The Chancellor didn't mention anything to us tonight [during the Saleh Walk]. He only asked us for his support." Billard said. Although nothing had been formally submitted to the SGA for tonight's meeting, Billard guessed "something, of some form, would be said."

The only explanation that Howe, who made security cameras one of his major campaign issues, had heard was that their installment was "related to fires and the riot

Safety walk inspects campus

Political science major Jennifer Teixeira, as well as other UMass students participated in last night's safety walk around campus.

By Mary Grein

Despite poor weather conditions the semi-annual safety walk drew a moderate crowd last night to evaluate the condition of campus, many noting that things are better than past years.

"Things have improved a lot. Every six months I go on this walk and things seem to get progressively better each time," said Richard Kula, a Physical Plant employee.

Individuals on the walk, which included members of the administration, Chancellor David K. Scott, physical plant employees, students and representatives from the Student Government Association, split into five sub-groups covering the entire campus.

Each group accessed the conditions of the paths, in addition to pointing out where lighting needed to be added or bulbs changed, where shrubs could use trimming and checked all call boxes to assure they were working properly.

Most of the smaller improvements noted, in particular the fixing of already existing lights, could be made within the next week according to Kula.

More expensive suggestions would be brought to the Summit on Safety where they will be prioritized and completed as the budget allowed. As Ken Campbell, Chair of the Safety Committee and SGA Senator said, what gets done and in what order depends on the funding that is allotted.

The group commented that a new call box will be put in place this summer as a result of a past recommendation. "One of the top recommendations for call boxes [is] by the Southwest tunnel [which] will go in this summer," Teixeira said.

One suggestion that would be passed onto the committee from last night's portion of the walk, including the main academic buildings, was to put lights under the bus stops, said Deputy Chief Officer Larry Holmes.

Chancellor David K. Scott said this was his first time walking on the safety walk, but that he had walked around the campus last November during the time of the assaults and had found some areas, especially near what is commonly known as the "Rape Trial" stairs."

He said he felt the safety walk was a positive way to determine where different unsafe areas on campus were and to work toward increasing safety on campus.

"There's always room for improvement," Campbell said. He said the walk each semester brings to light main things that could otherwise go unnoticed, making a suggestion on the walk for a possible spotlight on the backside of Goodell.

"I felt the walk was very successful," Campbell said. "It was a good group of people that turned out, especially considering the weather and we found a lot of things that will hope to be fixed in the next couple of years."

Spring Concert slated for May 7

The 2000 Spring Concert will take place at the Mullins Center on Sunday, May 7. University Productions and Concerts (UPC) along with the Student Government Association announced yesterday that the headlining acts for the performance will be Del Tam Artist Method Man and Redman. Other acts that will be included are Long Beach Dub All-stars and Beenie Man. There will also be a second stage that will include rapper Jazzbubble as well as the winner of the "Southwest Battle of the Bands." Biz Markie will be the Master of Ceremonies for the entire show.

Besides the concert, the event boasts several other activities including: a carnival from 12-4 p.m. that will showcase dunk tanks, Velcro walls, and other activities. The concert will start at 4:30 p.m.

Method Man and Redman have been touring together for the past few months after the release of the album, Blackout! The stop at the Mullins Center is only one of their many University performances which include the University of Maine, the University of Pennsylvania and Cornell University. The two will bring a high profile act that will surely excite the UMass crowd.

In an interview with Def Jam records, Redman said, "Hip-hop has been good to us. We never want to go away. Hip-hop is back to the hardcore. Blackout! is not the first time that the two rappers collaborated. They

Leaping from playgrounds to primates

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Senior biology major Tess Griffin spends her day like most University of Massachusetts students: studying, going to class, socializing and spending her afternoon performing research in a primate lab. Still, unlike most students, Griffin is one of the youngest students to graduate from UMass at the age of 17.

Griffin said there is nothing special in what she did. Her decision to skip eighth through twelfth grade and enter college at the age of 13-years-old was a decision that she said "felt just right."

"I've been wanting to go to college ever since I was 11 and I think a lot of it has to do with my father," Griffin said. "He went back to school when he was older so I had him as a role model. A lot of it was me wanting to go to college and he knew I could take that step and I knew I could do it too."

To most students, the leap from high school to college is a big step, but Griffin said amidst all the pressure that existed for her to achieve a high school diploma, she came to UMass without one.

"I was going to go from seventh to ninth grade and I was going to do that so I could do dual enrollment and go to high school and college at the same time," Griffin said. "But they didn't want to put me through that. It involved a lot of expensive tests and we didn't have the money to go through that, so we went over here (UMass)."

There were more than a few obstacles standing in Griffin's path when she first applied to UMass. Having received no high school diploma and having not taken the SAT's, she said the university was reluctant in recognizing her status as a full-time student until she had taken her SAT's and fulfilled high school credits. However, at age 13, she wasn't old enough to take the standardized test and the university would only allow her to take classes through continuing education.

It was then that her father, Robert Griffin, a management professor at UMass, appealed to the university to allow his daughter to enroll as a special student.

"She wasn't being challenged in junior high and then she came up with the idea that she could go to college," Professor Griffin said. "I teach college-level classes and I thought that she might just be able to do it."

Power outage in SW leads to vandalism

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts issued a Public Safety Alert on Monday, April 10 after receiving two reports of suspicious activity involving bathrooms in Washington Tower and McNamara Dorm. The reports were investigated by the UMPD and it has determined that it was individuals attempting to look into shower stalls.

The UMPD is also asking students to call the tip line if they have any information concerning the "significant disturbance" in Southwest on Saturday, April 8 during a power outage. Also during the weekend, police apprehended a want-to-be lobiate thief as he tried to smuggle away a stolen plant from the Franklin Dining Commons.

According to Jim Lyons, a UMPD spokesman, in each of the incidents people called in suspicious persons. When police arrived, they found that there was actually someone in the bathrooms looking in the showers.

Witnesses have been able to supply distinctive descriptions that have not been released because they may impede police investigation. Lyons said there "may be further information coming out" concerning the investigation.

Police are asking that anyone who witnesses any suspicious activities should report them to the UMass police as soon as possible either by calling 911 or 545-2121.

Police are also asking anyone with information regarding last Saturdays disturbance in Southwest to call their tip line at 577-TIPS (8477). The disturbance allegedly involved vandalism and the burning of student and University property and an assault and battery. The disruption occurred after a raccoon allegedly entered into a Western Massachusetts Electric Company (WMGC) electrical substation and came into direct contact with the power equipment knocking out power in Amherst, Deerfield, Hadley, Hatfield, Montague, Leverett, Shutesbury, Sunderland and Whately.

Police

Roundup

A large group of students gathered in the Southwest Mall area and lit a desk and furniture on fire, fueling the blaze with books. According to Lyons, the flames reached as high as the second floor of Southwest. Students in the buildings threw objects such as bottles out of their windows and onto the ground below. Lyons said that miraculously nobody was seriously hurt.

Jared Thor Bruun, age 21, of Acton and John M. Moran, age of 20 of Arlington, were arrested during the disturbance. Moran was charged with disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and burning personal property valued at over $25. Bruun was charged with disorderly conduct, and inciting a riot.

On Friday, April 7 at 7:48 p.m., police sighted a suspicious individual walking up Chancellor's Drive carrying a rather large plant. Police stopped the man and through their investigation discovered that the plant, actually a fake tree, had been stolen from the Franklin DC. Lyons said the individual, a 20-year-old male from Lancaster, will probably be charged with larceny once the worth of the plant is established.

North Carolina school battles bussing issue

By Matt Atwood
The Chronicle (Duke U.)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. — In 1971, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school district was the site of the precedent-setting U.S. Supreme Court decision, Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, requiring local schools to achieve racial diversity, even if it meant busing students. Today, the same district lies on the opposite end of the dispute over race-based school assignments.

While the school district awaits a 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals trial, stakeholders are speculating whether the judicial system will now reverse years of busing – and, some would say, significant steps toward integration.

Meanwhile, residents of North Carolina are considering the way to address diversity in the state's public schools.

In a case brought by seven white parents, U.S. District Judge Robert Potter ruled in September that the district cannot continue busing. The ruling found that, although disparities between schools still existed, that the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school system had achieved "unitary status" and no longer discriminated based on race.

The school system appealed the case to the 4th Circuit, while two more parents joined the original seven. The court is scheduled to hear oral arguments this June.

Arthur Griffin, chair of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, insists that the 1971 Supreme Court ruling still applies to the school district because conditions have not progressed far enough in the past 30 years.

"I can still see the vestiges of a dual system ...," he said. "The injunction against race is precedent-setting in this [current] case. No judge has ever gone so far as to say that you can't use race as a criterion for school assignment]."

Potter wrote in his decision that, the school system is... resisting the removal of the desegregation order because it now wishes to use that order as a pretext to pursue race-conscious, diversity-enhancing policies in perpetuity."

Jim Puckett, a Board of Education member who voted against the board's 6-3 decision to appeal Potter's injunction, agreed, saying the board's focus should be educating low-income students regardless of race. "If I can close the educational gap [between rich and poor neighborhoods], then I can figure out how to deal with diversity on the other side of the road," he said.

Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Justice filed a brief with the 4th Circuit last month, arguing that Potter had not sufficiently examined whether the schools remained segregated. The brief took no stance on Potter's final decision.

Because of its rulings in similar cases, experts say the notoriously conservative court may confirm Potter's ruling against race-based assignment.

"I would not be surprised to see them uphold the decision," said Harry Wilson, the legal advisor to the North Carolina Board of Education.

Indeed, the court ruled against race-based assignment in two related cases last year.

The court upheld an Arlington, Va., district court ruling that race could not be used as a factor in magnet school admissions and overturned a Montgomery County, Md., decision allowing schools to reject race-based transfer requests.

The decision in this case will not significantly affect Durham schools, where assignments are decided by attendance zones in the vicinity of each school. A random lottery among applicants determines magnet school admissions.

"If somebody came in and said, 'We want to do the same thing [Potter called for],' – already been done," said David Holdzkom, assistant superintendent for research, development and accountability for Durham Public Schools.

But until two years ago, the magnet school lottery gave minorities a greater chance of being chosen, Holdzkom said. School officials moved away from this system because of court trends to reject race-based school assignment policies.

Pub kicks off drive for senior class

Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The Class of 2000 Senior Campaign Committee will start its eleventh annual Senior Campaign tonight with a party at the Pub Restaurant in Amherst.

The bash, co-sponsored by the Annual Fund, will launch the drive to collect money for the class of 2000's gift to the University. This year, the Senior Campaign Committee plans to renovate the Reserved Reading Room on the third floor of the W.E.B. DuBois Library.

"It's very bare, very uncomfortable. It needs to be spruced up a little bit," Jennifer Smedes, the Associate Director of Annual Giving said about the room.

"We're raising money to refurnish that room, and hopefully that room will be finished in a year," she continued.

The project will cost an estimated $25,000 and the committee hopes to raise at least $20,000 towards that cost.

According to Smedes, all of this year's seniors should receive a letter that gives an explanation of what the class gift is and details about the project itself.

"Its kind of an awareness event, we're hosting seniors, to put a bug in their ear about the campaign," she said.

"We will be calling all the seniors," Smedes said of the Annual Fund. "They can choose to contribute to the gift, they can choose to contribute to another area of campus, if, for example, they don't really feel a strong mission to the library, they want to give to their department or to their athletic team, they can."

"The program is hoping to raise over $20,000 for the project, and that should be quite a significant mark for the class of 2000," she said.

The event will be at the Pub, starting a 10 p.m. and is scheduled to end at 1 a.m., and will feature a D.J., free appetizers and an open bar.

"In the past we have rented out rooms in the Campus Center, but because many seniors live off-campus they prefer to go off-campus for events," Smedes said.

She also expects the chairpersons of the committee, seniors Sarah Boutwell and Stacey Whitbourne, to say a few words about the project.

Over the past eleven years classes have raised as much as $55,000 towards the gift, which have included a brand-new fence, left by last years senior class, as well as gifts of money to Escort Services and the Every Women's Center.

"We're just hoping to get a good crowd and we're hoping that the seniors will be generous contributors to the project," Smedes said.

"In 1998, for example, seniors raised over $20,000 for the senior gift. In 1999 they raised over $25,000, and in 1994 they raised over $55,000."

Past seniors have been generous, with donations of up to $250 being given towards the fund, she said

According to Smedes, this donation can be placed on one's credit card, differed until after graduation, or paid in installments.

"We're hoping to get about a $35 to $50 gift [from each senior]," she said.

Alumni honored at State House

Professional achievements awarded

By Virginia Avedisian
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, in the Great Hall of the Massachusetts State House, the Alumni Association presented its annual Distinguished Alumni Awards. A luncheon was followed by an address from President William Bulger, Speaker of the House Thomas Finneran and Senate President Thomas Birmingham.

The Alumni Association bestows the Distinguished Alumni Award in recognition of extraordinary professional achievement. This year's recipients were Evan Dobelle, president of Trinity College in Hartford, Conn.; James Kallstrom, former FBI director in New York City; Jeffery Taylor, CEO of monster.com; and poet Natasha Tretheway. In addition, Professor Ester Terry, head of the Afro-American studies, will receive the Distinguished Faculty Award, and retired journalism professor Howard Ziff will be named an honorary alumnus.

"Each year, the Alumni Association selects outstanding graduates who have made significant contributions in their various endeavors," said John Goodrich, president of the Alumni Association. He went on to say, "This year's list of honorees represents a broad spectrum of interests including the arts, business, community service, public service and service to the University. These individuals have taken the extra step to give back to society, a goal to which we should all aspire. We are pleased to recognize their accomplishments."

Evan Dobelle graduated from UMass in 1965 and is currently president of Trinity College. He has encouraged the college to forge close and mutual beneficial ties with the troubled urban neighborhood that surrounds it. Dobelle was named president of Middlesex Community College in 1987, Chancellor of San Francisco City College in 1991 and president of Trinity College in 1995.

James Kallstrom graduated from UMass in 1966 and is best known for overseeing the FBI investigations into the crash of TWA Flight 800 and the bombing of the World Trade Center. He is currently senior vice president of MBNA America, host of the "FBI Files" on the Discovery Channel, and a law enforcement consultant with CBS News.

Jeffery Taylor attended UMass in the 1970s and early '80s and received an MBA from Harvard Business School. He is the CEO of Monster.com and EMP interactive. He is also responsible for the growth and direction of all EMP Worldwide properties and developments relating to the Internet. He was also recently in the headlines for setting the world's record for blimp water-skiing.

Esther Terry graduated from UMass in 1974 and has been head of the department of Afro-American studies at UMass since 1988, and received the Distinguished Faculty Award. She currently serves as the University's associate chancellor for equal opportunity and diversity, a role she has had for the past two years.

Natasha Tretheway graduated with a creative writing degree in the MFA program at UMass in 1995. She received the Distinguished Young Alumna Award. She is an assistant professor of English at Auburn University in Alabama.

Howard Ziff was named an honorary alumnus of the University. He attended Amherst College and Columbia University. He was a reporter and Korea bureau chief for Pacific Stars and Stripes, and worked as a reporter, editor and editorial writer for the Chicago Daily News. Ziff taught at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, and headed the Program for Minority Journalists at Columbia University before joining the UMass faculty in 1971. He served as department chair for more than 10 of his 27 years at the University.

Anti-sweatshop students rally under Worker Rights Consortium

By Jen Fish
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. — As anti-sweatshop activists were arrested in protests on college campuses nationwide during the past week, University activists gathered in New York on Friday at the first Worker Rights Consortium conference.

The WRC, a primarily student developed organization designed to enforce labor codes of conduct in the production of collegiate apparel, has generated controversy coast-to-coast as student activists push their administrations to become part of the organization.

The University of Michigan joined the group in February along with the University of Wisconsin at Madison and Indiana University. The decision was seen as a great boost to the WRC, as its previous members were comprised of only six schools with little collegiate apparel licensing clout.

Many university administrators had been looking to the conference as an indicator of how the WRC will be structured and governed. Of particular concern to University of Michigan administrators is the chance to be one of the three collegiate representatives on the organization's governing board. But the election for these positions was delayed.

The election is expected to be held sometime before June, which is when the governing board is scheduled to hold its first meeting. Before then, the WRC's 44 member schools will continue working together to further organize.

situation Saturday night." Students burned a security desk Saturday night during a power outage in front of Washington Residence Hall. Two were suspended yesterday after being charged in connection to the fire.

Howe felt the cameras would do nothing but make people feel uncomfortable. He suggested a community watch or "more interactive measures before monitoring how people live." Howe wondered where funding for the new cameras would come from.

"We can't get adequate lighting or call boxes," Howe said, later expressing disbelief saying that he "didn't think he'd [Scott] install video cameras."

Howe, Avakian and Billard all said student input should have been considered before the decision had been made.

is deliberately damaged or destroyed. Scott said, "I see no reason why University or taxpayers' funds should be used to pay for damage caused by a small number of hooligans." Scott emphasized that most UMass students do not participate in such behavior and said "a small minority" damages the campus' reputation.

Vanin said she did not suspend the students involved in the rape earlier because she "was waiting to get information directly from the victim, other than the charges issued in court. I didn't have any other information."

Vanin said the decision to suspend all of the students was made yesterday after consulting with another dean. "With each of these cases it was very difficult," she said. Vanin said she decided there was enough cause for concern about the danger all of these students presented to the campus to institute an interim restriction against the students. An interim restriction is imposed without prior notice. Said Vanin, "It doesn't happen often. I only use it in very serious situations, but the full process begins with that move."

A suspension is only a forced severance from the University for a fixed period of time. At this time, the students have not been expelled but once the judicial process moves further ahead, the possibility is there.

As of now, no date has been set for the judicial hearings to begin, Vanin said. "Were just in the first steps, so no hearings have been scheduled yet. We are trying to move as quickly as we can in the judicial process."

The press release said that Scott has called for a meeting with the leadership of the Student Government Association to discuss the installation of video cameras and other campus safety issues and to seek the support of the leadership of the student body in making the campus safer.

Greek life pitches in

By Joseph Collins
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts fraternities and sororities have been working hard to make a child's wish come true. Working in mutual co-operation with the Make-A-Wish Foundation of Western & Central MA, Inc., the Greek community has collectively raised approximately $2,124 this semester en route to their goal of sponsoring one child's wish.

The Make-A-Wish Foundation of Western & Central MA, Inc. was incorporated in 1987, and since then, 555 wishes have been granted for area children. The foundation's mission is to "grant the special, heartfelt wishes of local children, ages 2-17, who are diagnosed with terminal or life-threatening illnesses. A wish gives a child an escape from their daily routines of hospital visits and medical treatments and allows them to enjoy something they have always dreamed of."

Wishes granted are always the choice of the child and usually include trips, computers, shopping sprees, or to meet their favorite celebrity. If the wish is for a trip, parents and siblings are included. The average cost of a wish is $4,500, and all money is raised by the private sector. Out of every dollar donated, 92 cents is used towards a child's wish. The other eight cents goes to pay the four employees who cover Western and Central Massachusetts. Presently, 52 children are waiting for their wishes to be granted and five additional children are awaiting medical approval.

The work on campus began early this semester when Junior Economics major Chris Carey, the Philanthropy Chair of Pi Lambda Phi fraternity, contacted Diane Barstow, the Director of Development of the Make-A-Wish Foundation in this area. "[She] was excited to work with the Greek community," Mr. Carey stated.

From there, organization began within the Greek community on campus to start up various fundraising drives and events. On April 1, members of fraternities Delta Chi, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Alpha Sigma Phi, Delta Sigma Phi, Alpha Delta Phi, and Pi Lambda Phi, and members of sororities Sigma Delta Tau, Sigma Kappa, Kappa Kappa Gamma, Chi Omega, and Alpha Chi Omega participated in a car wash at Rafter's Sports Bar that raised $567. This past Friday, April 7, the Pub, in conjunction with members of UMass fraternities and sororities, raised $1,180 towards the foundation. In addition, members of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity held a social event that raised $575, and members of Chi Omega sorority raised $200 by selling Make-A-Wish angels in the UMass dormitories.

The Greek community plans on continuing work with the Make-A-Wish Foundation this semester and next year. Throughout April, angels will be sold for $1 in the Campus Center, as well as other unspecified activities that may also concur with Greek Week (April 27-30). Another future activity being organized by Kathleen Banks and the Chi Omega Sorority is a consignment sale designed to allow students to purchase high-end suits for job interviews and work at low costs. This event will occur sometime in May. Next year, the Greek Community plans on expanding its fundraising work to include the entire student body through a Greek-wide dance-a-thon.

Michael D. Wiseman, Director of Greek Affairs, says of the Inter-Fraternal Co-operation, "In the past, groups would do their own events. This is the first time I can think of in a while that everybody has been asked to work together. Hopefully that will give students the opportunity to meet people from other chapters and break down [those] stereotypes."

On how this community service work may help on-campus perception of the Greek community, Mr. Wiseman says, "If the fraternities and sororities are successful in putting together an event that is well known it may help break down stereotypes. Not everyone will want to join [a fraternity or sorority], but [the non-Greek students] may see some benefits in joining and some of the beneficial activities."

Sophomore Kathleen Banks, a Psychology major and member of the sorority Chi Omega, says of Make-A-Wish Foundation and the Inter-Fraternal co-operation, "Personally I am very touched by the fact it affects so many children ... to do what they couldn't do without [it]. [It] brought us together a lot for a certain camaraderie."

Presently those involved in raising funds for the Make-A-Wish Foundation have not met with any of the children. However, Chris Carey hopes that it may happen next semester. He also hopes that the work with the foundation may be able to spark interest in the Greek community.

Diane Barstow says of the foundation that they "... are very excited to be working with the students at the University. [The volunteers] are an incredible group of people, and they are very generous in their desire to help out wish children. My experience with them has been incredible. They contacted us ... they're a great group of students."

For more on-going information of the Greek communities work with the Make-A-Wish Foundation contact the Greek Affairs office at 545-2711. For more information on the Make-A-Wish Foundation itself, or to refer a child to the foundation call (413) 733-9474.

KARA THOMAS / Collegian

Four years ago this 17-year-old was in junior high, now Tess Griffin will graduate from UMass as one of the youngest students ever to have recieved her bachelors degree from here.

In her first two semesters enrolled as a special student through the Continuing Education Department, Griffin received all A's and the university acknowledged that she had the potential to take college-level classes.

In two years, her college credits satisfied her high school credits through a dual enrollment recognized by the state and at the age of 15, she had completed her SAT's and became recognized as a full-time undergraduate student.

"They [university] tried to say she would be truant. But because we were able to prove she'd be getting an equivalent or better education at UMass [as opposed to high school], then they wouldn't be able to win," Professor Griffin said. "I was impressed that the administration at the University of Massachusetts was willing to give her a chance."

Having gained status as a full-time student, Griffin focused her study on biology with a tract in neuroscience and behavior and a pre-med focus. She said the classes at first were difficult because she had arrived at the university with four years less educational experience than most students.

"I had difficulty with some of the classes," Griffin said. "I was hard to keep up because I hadn't had that material before and a lot of the other students had in high school, but I was able to learn it and go through with it."

With only a math background in pre-algebra, Griffin soon discovered her self excelling in courses such as introductory physics that required her to be knowledgeable in the areas of trigonometry and calculus.

Griffin indicated that she has discovered an immeasurable passion working for the last two years at a primate lab on campus that conducts research on the social and cognitive behavior of macaques. Under the supervision of Melinda Novak, chair of the psychology department, Griffin said she has found a love for research that she hopes to continue beyond her undergraduate study.

Griffin will become a graduate student next fall in Neuroscience and Behavioral Studies. She said she will receive her master's degree in one year under a five-year program. With this accomplishment, she will set another record as one of the youngest students to receive a masters degree at UMass-Amherst.

Griffin was born in Florida and moved residences numerous times before her family settled in Hadley, where they are currently living. Her school experience was always widespread, she says. "It's never been one thing."

Even with such expenses however, Griffin said she never had a doubt in her mind that she could accomplish what hard students only think about setting out to do.

"I was a good student, but a lot of people are good students and a lot of people could have done what I did and I was just lucky enough to have the resources and the opportunity to do so," Griffin said. "I think it's having a different mindset and I had a single goal in mind and it wasn't a high school diploma. It was getting a bachelors' degree and I [have] achieved that goal."

While some students ask Griffin if she has any regrets, she said she has none in making a decision that she knew would, to some extent, affect her social life, but change her academic life forever.

Having never lived on campus, not having a driver's license and not being able to socially interact easily with students her own age, Griffin laughs when she retells her stories about 22 year old male students flirting with her.

"They didn't know how old I was, so I tried to blend in, talk about the same things they do, but it's different," Griffin said. "Invite me to bars or something. I can't do that. There's just no room for that."

Griffin said she doesn't like telling people her age because she says it might cause them to look at her differently, something that she says she doesn't want to be taken at face value.

"Some people think I'm full of myself and that's the last thing I want them to think so that's why I don't like telling people," Griffin said. "Age is not what matters here. I am who I am and I just want people to treat me for who I am and not how old I am."

Griffin has remained on the Dean's List every year as an undergraduate student and is also part of the Phi Beta Kappa and Golden Key National Honors Society.

Our Opinion

The naked mile

For the first time in 14 years, would-be participants in the annual "Naked Mile" on the Ann Arbor campus of the University of Michigan next Friday are facing the threat of arrest from police of that city. The midnight streak, traditionally run to celebrate the last day of classes at UM, drew more than 10,000 runners and spectators last year and has been deemed a safety hazard by local authorities.

We at the Daily Collegian feel that police intervention into the Naked Mile constitutes a serious attack on arguably the most harmless and customarily tolerated of collegiate traditions, and is of a sort of immoral persecution that belies an ulterior motive by authorities.

The legal implications of running naked across a college campus are impossible to ignore, of course. Laws against indecent exposure have existed for hundreds of years, and are absolutely necessary for the protection of children and anyone else who simply does not wish to be exposed to the unclothed forms of others.

But the powers and subsequent limits of any law lie in its interpretation, and considering that the Naked Mile is run traditionally at midnight, the established logic is that those people whom the race's running might truly harm or offend probably won't have any contact, visual or otherwise, with its participants.

Which leads to what authorities have declared the true danger of the Naked Mile: "the potential for serious injury." The race's route traverses UM's busy Washtenaw-South University Avenues intersection, a traffic artery that police are unable to shut down. This would seem at first to be a viable excuse for suppression of the event.

But Ann Arbor Police aren't arresting every runner. The force's five-man "Intervention team" have been trained to specifically apprehend naked participants.

That distinction proves that the target of the authorities is indeed nudity, not the event itself.

And isn't nudity one of the most frequent "disturbances" traditionally employed by college students in America over the last four or five decades? Even at this conventionally conservative university, there are sports teams that celebrate a player's first score with a ritual demanding a display of nude public athleticism. Thousands of college students display random body parts out of moving cars on the way to spring break destinations every year, and at those same destinations indecent exposure laws were seemingly written off the books years ago. The same applies to the Mardi Gras festival in New Orleans.

So what is the real enemy of Ann Arbor officials?

With each running, the Naked Mile has attracted more and more racers, spectators and overall outside attention. Video cameras appeared along the course lines years ago, but with the recent explosion in Internet coverage of the event, the Naked Mile has begun to be an annually awaited feature item among a number of pornographic websites.

It is hard to imagine that the University of Michigan relishes this type of exposure, and residents of the city itself have made a point of trumpeting the area's "clean living" since Ann Arbor was voted the "fifth-most livable city in the country" by Money magazine in 1996.

The Collegian feels that by arresting naked runners in this year's race after turning the proverbial other cheek since 1986, authorities in Michigan are admitting that they cannot go to war against the capital-driven Web. They will likely encounter much less resistance from college students, and they know it.

Those arrested may face charges of indecent exposure, a misdemeanor that carries a maximum penalty of one year in jail and a $500 fine. And in an even more disturbing measure, anyone arrested for indecent exposure is subsequently named in the state police's Sex-Motivated Crime Report.

These penalties are stiff enough to warrant accusations of injustice, but the real problem is much larger. By jailing the joggers in the Naked Mile, Ann Arbor Police are locking up the greater freedom of harmless collegiate tradition.

And we at the Collegian believe that freedom of that sort is definitely worth fighting for.

The "truth" about Oliver North

Last Thursday, Oliver North spoke in the lobby of the Fine Arts Center and told us all that we should get involved in the American democratic process and vote. It was a delightful performance. Highlights included watching North keep a straight face while making statements like "Pat Buchanan is not a racist," and "Ronald Reagan was the best President America has had in my lifetime." Outside, a small but very vocal group of protesters nagged at the lecture like a conscience, with cries of "traitor" and "murderer."

"They're not here to protest me," North reassured everyone; "they're here to protest my prior existence."

Ah. Referring to his past as a "prior existence" is apparently North's way of separating himself from his past actions, without apologizing for them. But it's never that easy.

Let's face it: the man's as rotten and deceitful as they come. For the Republican Club to have presented him as an American hero is laughable. I am not arguing North's right to speak here, though by right he should be in prison right now. But the responsible course of action for the Republican Club would have been to present in their introduction of North a complete and balanced background of the man. Instead they focused on his valor in Vietnam (which may well be commendable, but that doesn't place him above moral reproach) and the fact that he served on Reagan's National Security Council. Here's some of the stuff they left out:

Back in the early 1980s, Nicaraguan revolutionaries (the "Contras") were fighting to overthrow the Marxist-leaning Sandinista government. The Sandinistas biggest crime in the eyes of the Reagan Administration was overthrowing a despotic, U.S.-backed dictator in 1979. The war in Nicaragua was, basically, a civil war, which we had no right getting involved in (sound familiar?). The CIA did get involved, though, giving the Contras money and training. In 1983, Congress passed the Boland Amendment, making it illegal for the U.S. to aid the Contras. But the Reagan Administration circumvented Congress by soliciting foreign money and secretly funneling it down to the Contras.

Meanwhile, in Beirut in 1984, Iranian-backed terrorists kidnapped the CIA's Beirut station chief. Six other Americans were kidnapped in Beirut that same year. Publicly, Reagan took a tough stand against the terrorists. But on September 15, 1985, 408 U.S. missiles were secretly sold to Iran. It was illegal for the U.S. to sell arms to Iran because Iran had been designated a "terrorist state" by Congress.) The same day that the missiles arrived in Iran, one of the American hostages was released. Strange coincidence, eh?

Boomer Pinches

Oliver North was the man in charge of both supporting the Contras and the arms-for-hostages deal in Iran. He had the bright idea of passing on profits from the Iran arms sales to the Contras. He was instrumental in setting up what basically amounted to a shadow government of administration officials, businessmen, intelligence agents, and hired mercenaries. North and his crew operated in defiance of Congress and U.S. law. Both Reagan and George Bush claimed they had no idea what North was up to, but it is at best a very, very dubious claim.

The funny thing is, the arms-for-hostages deal didn't even work that well. By April of 1986, the U.S. had secretly shipped over a thousand missiles to Iran. In return they had received a grand total of one hostage. And many of the planes bringing weapons to Nicaragua came back bringing cocaine, which suggests that the CIA was using money from drug sales to aid the Contras. Eventually, the whole scheme was uncovered. North was tried, found guilty on three counts, and got off on technicalities. He ended up paying a fine and doing some community service in a drug program.

But none of the above was mentioned by the Republican Club. North himself only barely alluded to it as his "prior existence." Instead he told us college kids that this year's election was the most important election of our lifetime because this year is also a census year. His reasoning seemed to be founded on the fact that Lincoln, Kennedy, and Reagan were all elected in census years. If you can figure out what, exactly, the census had to do with any of them getting elected, or their being important presidents, let me know because as far as I can tell it was gibberish.

Like many conservatives in the media – he is currently one of those oxymorons we call "TV journalists" – North is an engaging, funny, charismatic speaker, and so long as you ignore the fact that what he says is almost entirely devoid of substance, it makes for wonderful entertainment. He brandished a copy of the U.S. Constitution, calling it a user's manual and claiming that he carried it with him at all times. He fielded a number of intelligent questions about his past that I'm sure he's heard a million times before, and thus deflected them slickly, garnering much applause from the audience and the sycophants in the Republican Club. He told people they should go get their facts straight, then proceeded to educate them with lies.

His basic message was very original: that young people can make a difference so we should all go out and vote. He neglected to mention that it doesn't matter a whole lot whether or not we vote since there will always be men like himself who abuse their power and act with total disregard for the democratic process.

I thought about mentioning this irony to him. I thought about telling him that I grew up wanting to be Alex P. Keaton from Family Ties, that I thought Ronald Reagan was a hero when I saw him on TV. I wanted to tell him that the idea of America thrilled me as a child, the idea that this was a country that invented itself in the name of freedom. I wanted to tell him what I felt at the ripe old age of ten when I saw him being questioned on TV and the realization slowly dawned on me that he was perjuring himself in uniform. I wanted to tell him that more than anything else that it was the Iran-Contra Hearings that woke me up to the fact that the reality of America was not the dream we'd had been. I wanted to tell him that the only use a person like him would have for the Constitution would be to wipe his own ass after he was finished defecating all over the ideals of democracy.

But I didn't bother. He wouldn't have understood at all. In a way it doesn't matter, I suppose, since twenty years from now, when everything can be seen in a larger historical perspective, it's doubtful that either North or his beloved Reagan will be fondly recalled. And anyone today who really believes that Ollie North is an American hero either doesn't know the facts about his past or doesn't care.

Ollie North telling me I should vote? If I were ten years old again, I'd say it was a joke so funny I forgot to laugh.

The first amendment: Our right to see porn

This is a story about porno, the Constitution and UMass being pro-actively afraid of everybody. It also includes a quick visit by Oliver North.

"Just about the only thing you can get right-wing extremists and left-wing feminists to agree on is that nobody should have any good whack-off materi-al."

-Drew Carey

Richard Burt had just that, a lot of whack-off material. Though of it to get his website kicked off the UMass web server. A 46-year-old English professor who studies pornography and censorship had his web-page booted after the University took issue with links to websites and photos of him fondling some breasts. Offering up the usual explanations for its removal, the University said it was inappropriate, unnecessary, and far too provocative.

Well, at least for UMass tastes, although the common taste is that anything that might make anyone a little bit uncomfortable is wrong wrong wrong.

Porn is nasty, immoral, improper, and damn it, it's just wrong. That goes pretty much across the board. Ask the feminists and they'll tell you it's degrading to women, it defines women as nothing more than sexual objects, it objectifies women. Ask the rightists and they'll tell you the feminists are dykes before they explain that porn is wrong because sex is wrong and porn leads to sex.

Sam Wilkinson

I don't know what Oliver North believes about most feminists, but he certainly seems to have issues with porn, and he hinted at that during last week's lecture. He wondered aloud, after making sure that we all knew he carried the Constitution and that everyone should be allowed to have a lot of guns, if porn was protected by the Constitution? He mentioned Burt, which got a laugh from the crowd. It was pretty funny stuff.

North is a politician who chooses to support one part from the Constitution and then claim that he supports it all, which he doesn't. If he did, he wouldn't joke about Burt, he'd wonder why our public institution was publicly announcing, in not quite these words, their opposition to the first amendment. He'd say that despite the fact he can't stand nudity, it's this man's right to put it on his website.

It would shock him and horrify him that a public institution would squelch free speech, right? Wrong. Like most Constitutionally idealist politicians, he's chosen his little part, the second amendment, to push as the one amendment that should be followed to the letter. The rest of the pesky amendments can go to hell.

Which is, at this point, fine, because at least he's supporting one part of our Constitution, and it's something UMass should look into, but we'll get to that.

Back to my story: the two sides in the issue see eye to eye on the relative badness of porn; they just can't decide why. But they do agree. Anything from a man with a woman, a woman with a woman, a man with a man, a man with a woman and a dog, three naked women doing an onion, two men doing a dog, whatever, it's absolutely outrageous, it's wrong. They'll explain this to you over and over. They'll attempt to win you over the "cudgel" method, assuming that if they simply beat the living hell out of your brains, you'll believe like they believe and that's the way to believe.

Both sides, of course, are missing major points about the pornography. The leftists conveniently ignore that the women appearing naked are choosing to appear naked; the rightists conveniently ignore their own sexuality and their enjoyment of said activity in an attempt to keep America morally "right."

But why both groups oppose it doesn't matter as much as that they do oppose it. And because of that opposition, UMass tells us, in vague terms, that they heard a complaint or two, so they took down the website.

Which, to a certain extent, is a gross violation of the right to free speech. Truth told, UMass can pick and choose what is put on that webpage, knowing full well that what is put on that webpage is a reflection of UMass in general. Speaking of UMass in general, I'd swear that my friends Abigail and Lisa, art majors, saw a lot of naked people in their drawing classes. And in the art textbooks that people are required to read, there are paintings of naked people, naked kids even, if you can imagine. And in English classes, people read stories with sex in them.

Hell, on the UMass server, if you search for "porn" and "nude" the found links aren't just links to Dick Burt's page that can be found. There's at least one picture of a woman topless, some drawings of naked guys, and there are probably more if one searches enough. If you really get bored, as I did, search enough to discover that, for an English teacher, Burt can't even spell porn, instead, he spells it pron, as in ...pronstars.html, a site that OIT, as of early Monday morning, managed to miss. So much for removing offending material.

Now, the question really is, why can one still find plenty of "t and a" in classes and on the server if we can't find it on Burt's page? The stuff on Burt's page, as near as I can tell, was stunning in its almost total lack of erotic value. That was definitely not the kind of quality porn that's available out there; it probably wasn't enough to encourage other men and women to clog the site to look at his webpage, and it certainly wasn't enough to warrant the UMass reaction.

But our University is afraid to just ante up and be honest with the world, tell us they don't like porn because they're a bunch of babies more afraid of the community response than anything else. They fear the left-wingers being all pissy about naked people being degraded, the right-wingers being all pissy about naked women being seen, and they fear what those two will do. They fear the extremes of free speech.

If Oliver North doesn't fear the extremes of gun ownership, can't our University at least not be afraid of the extremes of much less dangerous free speech?

Because where else but a University should such strange things be encouraged; if Burt wants to wear Annie Sprinkle's breasts on his head, if he wants strippers to sit on his face, whatever. That's his deal, and if it reflects even remotely something that he's taking the time to study, and it certainly does because he studies such things as pornographic interpretations of Shakespeare, it should be possible for him to post that up in his little corner of the UMass webpage.

Our little corner of academia would be well advised to be brave, to stick it out, and like Oliver North, pick their little part of the Constitution to support. We could pick the first amendment, and instead of doing such ridiculous things as limiting free speech, we could enable it. The fact that we have to learn that from North is sickening.

Against aid to Columbia

On March 30th, Congress passed a bill to provide $1.6 billion of military assistance to Columbia. The aid is designed to "train and equip" Columbian forces to combat drug cartels. The bill's Congressional champions insist the aid will impede the flow of heroin and cocaine across U.S. borders. House Speaker Dennis Hastert proselytized that America has a "responsibility to stop drugs in Columbia, to stop them in transit, to stop them at our border, to stop them in our streets and in our schools." So to "stop" the spread of drugs, the U.S. will give Columbia 30 modern Blackhawk helicopters and 33 older Huey helicopters. Additionally, $470 million will go to the Columbian army and $115 million to the police. Apparently no one told the Speaker that Columbia has an abominable pattern of human rights violations. U.S. military aid threatens to stabilize an already dangerously unstable country.

Congress's attempt to combat drug abuse is an admirable instinct. However, this bill miscalculates the realities in Columbia. The aid package assumes a scenario of "evil drug cartels vs. saintly Columbian army." In fact, many factions are involved in the drug violence and it's almost impossible to discern the good guys and bad guys. Several Marxist guerrilla groups are fighting the government.

Richard Anderson

These left-wing insurgents use kidnapping, torture, and assassination to further their cause. A major source of their funding comes from drug trafficking or by providing security to other traffickers. So on one level, by financing a Columbian war on drugs the U.S. is actually financing Columbia's civil war. Entering into a domestic conflict portends extreme danger for our country. The aid could lead the U.S. into a Vietnam-style imbroglio.

More fundamentally, the U.S. should have no ties to an organization as lawless and brutal as the Columbian military. Just as the left-wing opposition is violent, equally violent are the measures employed by the government to combat insurgency. According to Amnesty International, (see www.amnesty.org) paramilitary groups, supposedly illegal, operate in collusion with Columbian military to curb dissension. These paramilitaries killed hundreds of civilians last year in attacks against guerilla-held regions. Amnesty estimates that 300,000 Columbians were internally displaced by the fighting. More disturbing is evidence that Columbian military personnel work closely with the paramilitaries, either helping plan attacks or refusing to prosecute them for crimes. Last year a high-ranking General was accused of forming a "civilian vigilante association" consisting of several paramilitary groups. With the charges still pending, the General was promoted to head the Columbian army's intelligence operations. This clearly indicates that Columbia regards lightly the human rights abuses within its military.

Beyond its war with the rebels, the Columbian army has brutally repressed civilians and human rights defenders. Amnesty reports that "police-backed 'death squads'" operate furtively in impoverished areas. These "death squads" kill those termed "disposables" such as homosexuals, prostitutes, vagrants, and petty thieves. Last July, the outgoing Columbian President accepted state responsibility for the massacres. The government has also ignored threats and attacks against journalists, judges, political activists, and human rights workers, six of whom were murdered in 1999. Columbia is basically a lawless state where citizens have no protection from terror. With that knowledge in hand, America must act responsibly. We must not compound the problem by saturating the country with weapons and other military resources.

One would think the U.S. had learned its lesson about selling arms internationally. Last week a visit to our campus by Colonel Oliver North was protested by many. North was a principle actor in the Iran-Contra scandal in the 1980's. At President Reagan's behest, North sold weapons to Iran and then gave the profit to Nicaraguan contras fighting the left-wing Sandinista government. The entire operation was totally illegal, as Congress had specifically forbade supporting the Contras. When North's activities became public, the ugliest scandal of the decade followed.

Unlike Iran-Contra, which was perpetuated surreptitiously, the proposed aid to Columbia is public knowledge. This time the American people know exactly what is happening. We must make it clear that we don't want our country financing terror in Latin America. There are other methods of combating the drug problem.

The New York Times reports that 800,000 people have fled Columbia in the past four years. A young man preparing to emigrate pondered the possible effects of U.S. aid: "If things are this bad now, what is going to happen when all that gringo money gets here? The whole country is going to become a war zone." In the Columbian drug wars, a few violent, ruthless factions are in conflict. American aid will simply add fuel to the fire. This cannot happen. The Columbian people have been burned enough.

Rethinking campus politics

Sometime within the last year, when I was lamenting my lack of career direction, one of my relatives suggested that I go into politics. I laughed derisively. Me? Politics? I don't think so. Thai and chemical engineering are two things that I just can't do – at least not well.

Why am I not interested in politics? First of all, people in our parents' generation are cynical about government because of past events such as Watergate and Vietnam, and perhaps because of some whacked-out, mutated gene, I seem to have inherited this cynicism and distrust. The notion that many young people have that government is bad is reinforced by news stories that explain how many millions of dollars the government is wasting each second, tell how corrupt political leaders are these days, and present other examples of mismanagement and general incompetence.

Alexis Pushkar

Secondly, I believed throughout my high school career that government was inherently a boring topic, and I didn't pay attention to anything I was taught about government. I took a few classes here and there about the checks and balances of the federal government, and I was supposed to learn how many Representatives there are in the House. Let's just say I probably would not become a millionaire if asked that question today.

A third factor that influences why I – and probably other people – do not actively involve myself in political matters concerns the fact that I never participated in community activities (at least to a large extent), and local governments are concerned primarily with the local community. Many people today are isolated within their own homes and their own lives, and without involving themselves in the community, they don't become involved with local government.

Thus many decent honest people are disinterested in political matters or become disinterested quickly if they attempt to involve themselves, and the door is opened for the corrupt and the power hungry. When corrupt, power-hungry people become involved in local, state or national governments, they reinforce the idea that government is about corruption and greed.

I would like to believe that government does not have to be about corruption if the right people are elected and the system is set up to avoid it, but I think history has the beat on this one. Few leaders in the real world have inspired me to actively participate in politics and virtually none of the people that participate in political student leadership on the UMass campus have inspired me to become involved.

And yet I always thought a good leader should empower people to become involved in the leadership of the community. Holding an Ed/Op editorial position here at the Collegian for the past two years has allowed me to have a privileged ear on a whole lot of campus complaints. Many of them are not well thought out or well researched. A great deal of them come from people who aren't involved in trying to change things. I think people have the impression that the Chancellor and other administrators sit in some ivory tower and discuss how to screw students over. The decisions that they make are complicated, just like the decisions that the national government makes, and sometimes from an outside perspective they seem really messed up.

"I think people have the impression that the Chancellor and other administrators sit in some ivory tower and discuss how to screw students over."

Sometimes administrators make decisions that are not student friendly because no students were consulted. The SGA provides one vocal and highly publicized way for students to voice their opinions, but some students like myself may not want to play that political game. Another way students are heard here is through activism and protests, but while I often support the causes, protests just aren't my thing.

But there are other ways to be involved on various committees that shape aspects of students' lives here at UMass. There is a little known list of committees – 45 committees in all – that call for student involvement. There is the Affirmative Action Advisory Board, the Bilingual Collegiate Program Advisory Board, the Chancellor's Task Force on Jewish Awareness and Anti-Semitism, several councils in many areas on the Faculty Senate, the Sexual Assault Advisory Committee, and others. Some of these positions are SGA appointed, but others are not and the people in charge welcome student involvement. After all, what student really wants a bunch of faculty members making decisions for him?

However, the SGA leadership in the past year has done a poor job of involving students on these committees. They have not publicized these committees, which has decreased leadership opportunities on campus. As leaders, they should empower people to become involved in these committees and get students excited about shaping their communities in a leadership role. The president of the SGA need not take on this task personally, but he should encourage senators, who theoretically have the best and most direct connection with their constituents (at least the ones who live on campus), to empower their constituents to become involved.

I understand that those involved in SGA are not motivational speakers (although a good Chris Farley impression might go a long way toward improving the image of the SGA), but those who are passionate about politics should communicate some of that passion to a mostly apathetic student body. When the current crop of old white men who run this country finally meet their maker (who will probably be a subsidiary of Coca Cola at that point in time) some leaders are going to have to take their places. A generation of people who have spent their lives watching mindless television, detached from the community around them probably isn't going to solve the complicated problems of the world. That our children are going to grow up thinking that government is useless and corrupt and not wanting to be involved in politics and.

Thoughts, ruminations

I've had one of those weeks. I think you know what I am talking about: one of those weeks when your mind just skips and jumps around leading you to think about stuff that you never even gave a second thought to. Here is an all too telling montage of my thoughts. Enjoy my insanity.

It all began last week when my girlfriend's parents came up to visit. Also along for the trip was Kerri's three-year-old sister Alison. On Friday afternoon when they arrived in Amherst, they decided to go eat at the The Amherst Brewing Company. When the waitress asked Alison what she wanted to eat she said, "Ummmm... a monster." Her mother said, "Alison you cannot have a lobster." To which she replied, "OK...ummmm a hot dog." Man you've got to love kids.

I was watching television (or as the English call it, the telly) this week when a commercial for Fixodent came on. The thought of having dentures horrifies me and probably horrifies a great deal of other people as well. So you can imagine my surprise when a cavalier older gentleman was leaning on the hood of his car and when talking about his dentures said, "I almost forgot they were there." Sweet Jesus! All of your teeth have fallen out or have been removed from your head, requiring you to snap in a set of teeth made of epoxy and you forgot they were there? I think he had his Depends diaper strapped on too tight.

Brian Lohnes

On one of the ensuing days I was headed for my bi-weekly shower and for God knows what reason noticed that nothing in a dorm building is held together with a normal kind of fastener. The number plates on our doors are held on by weird looking screws along with a good number of things in the bathroom. The lights in the halls even have these Martian fasteners. The one thing that the University has decided to use regular screws on are the screens that prevent us from heaving ourselves out the windows. Great move, guys. I can't steal a cover off a dimly lit bathroom light, but with a Phillips screwdriver I can try base-jumping out of my window.

On Saturday night I attended the Elton John concert with my girlfriend Kerri. Mr. John ripped the lid off the Mullins Center. A few of his fans almost made me rip the lid off them. First off we had a woman who had the ability to whistle at the perfect pitch to make blood shoot from our ears. I actually saw a spectator across the arena clutch his head soon before it exploded from the pitch. This woman seemed to be about three-feet-tall and she had the uncanny ability to make it seem as though she was whistling directly into our ears. Banshees were running in terror. If you do the whistle, you are going to hell.

Secondly there was a man who, so help me God, bathed in his own sweat before attending the show. This guy put the ink in stink. I really can't do full justice to his aroma, but go hang out in the hockey team's locker room after a game and that might get you started. This same guy kept yelling, "We love you, E.J." and after one hour into the show repeatedly screamed, "One more, E.J., one more!" One more? Jeez, man, the guy is barely getting started. The long and short of it is that I smelled, my girlfriend smelled and "E.J." played for another two hours.

Did anyone else know that Elton John is gay? Just wondering.

During the show, Elton played his big hit, "Can you feel the love tonight." Not a real favorite of mine but I can't sing to save my ass so my opinion doesn't matter much. Anyhow, when he began singing, a large video screen began playing a montage of clips from, "The Lion King" at the end of which there was a love scene between two lions. I will repeat, a love scene between two lions. The two lions tunneled to the ground, the female (I didn't see any evidence, so I am taking a stab at it here) narrowed her eyes and the male lion's eyes bulged and then in a moment of touching passion, the female lion licked the male lion. Licked the male lion. Why the hell does there need to be a friggin' love scene between two lions? Real lions kill things. Then chomp on the bodies of animals they catch and rip them apart. Romance? No. Elton John singing a love ballad behind them while they, "Do it like they do on the Discovery Channel"? Think not.

The SGA meeting last week was a mess. I will reiterate a comment my esteemed editor Mr. Gary Mendese first expressed: "some people need to be recycled." Channel 19 must love airing those meetings because ratings must go through the damn roof. What happens to kids when they go into the SGA? It seems like every meeting is a circus. Bring in a pony and a clown and you could charge admission. Outbursts, personal battles, drunk people at meetings (a claim substantiated by three different people on three different occasions who told me this completely out of the blue and none of the people know each other. All were in attendance at the said meeting and acknowledged several SGA members were drunk). Now I ask how the hell this can happen? The SGA seems to attract a "certain kind of person." I am not saying all SGA members are lunatics but there is at least one as evidenced by last weeks meeting.

I could go on for a while with stuff like this but who the hell would want that? So to re-cap, don't do the whistle, don't jump out the window. Is Elton John gay? Never would have guessed. Lions do not make-a da love, and if you are going to the SGA meeting, be sure to stop off at the Pub, a few drinks take the edge off of decision-making.

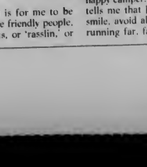
Keep your beliefs and I'll stick to mine



I am not a religious man.

I sincerely mean that. I don't go to church or temple or mosque or anything. I don't read any sort of religious text, nor do I find meaning in any of the other people's stories about what's in them. I'm not really an agnostic or even an atheist, really. I guess you could call me an "ignorist" or some other made-up word for someone who simply doesn't give a thought at all to the matter, even an atheist spends some time justifying his decision. I make no effort to explain myself – I was simply born without an ounce of faith in my body. Sorry.

That's not to say that my parents (well, my mom mostly) didn't try their damnedest. A good Irish Catholic woman – my mom is – and she made every effort to save my soul. CCD? I did that. Retreats? Check. Confirmation? Yes siree, I am an official Soldier of God, confirmed in the One True and Holy Catholic Church. My saint's name is Patrick. It was all just going through the motions for me, though. I never bought it. It was just the path of least resistance, a way to not unnecessarily piss my mother off and get grounded. Whatever... it worked. And when people ask me what religion I am, I still say Catholic, and I guess it's technically true. That's what it says on my Census.

Which brings me to the point of this little whizbanger here. I'm pretty comfortable with my lack of beliefs here on this mortal coil. It doesn't distress me at all that I don't have any spiritual leaders or icons or whatever to turn to for guidance. Really, I'm cool with it. Lots of other people, however, don't seem to share my acceptance of this.

As far as I can generalize, there are two main types of religious people. The one is the quietly faithful, who have their beliefs and follow them and find some kind of fulfillment though them. These people I have quite a bit of respect for, and occasionally a bit of envy. Then there are the very vocally faithful. The people like this who I have come in contact with screem Jesus from every hilltop or, occasionally, directly into your ear, causing an annoying ringing sensation. They cannot rest until they are certain that I have found the light of at least pretended to do so. They cannot grasp how I would willingly not listen to them or shake my head and walk away.

Rob Schulze

You do not know how offensive it is for me to be around these people. Usually they're fine friendly people, people whom I can talk to about sports, or 'rasslin', or other such stuff without incident... until they drag Jesus into it, or, specifically, my lack of Jesus.

Case in point: I'm at work the other day and, as is my wont, clad in the ever-fashionable black Slayer Diabolus tour shirt. You know the one: it's black with orange demons around a pentagram on the front, and has orange demons and tour dates on the back. (Note to the uninitiated: the demon motif is a common one in the Slayer community. I once saw Slayer boxer shorts and socks in a catalog that had demons on them.) The conversation begins innocently enough: He asks me what my favorite Slayer song is. I reply. He tells me what his used to be; I joke that we're both going to hell (another common theme) and then try to walk away. Try to walk away.

He stops me. He looks deep into my eyes. "Rob," he says, "Jesus forgives."

'Arrrrrrrggggggghhhhhhhh' is what I scream to myself mentally. I am not a happy camper. I try to leave, but he sidesteps with me. He tells me that Jesus invented forgiveness. I smile a fake smile, avoid all eye contact, and continue my attempt at running far, far away. This continues for quite a while until I finally extricate myself and move into a position as far away from this beacon of salvation as possible.

There is no need for that to ever happen. I accept the religious beliefs of others. Catholic? Jew? Muslim? Exotic Protestant sect? Anything else? That is just dandy with me. I hope it makes you happy and that when you die you really do go to that wonderful place you dream about. I really mean that. It must be nice to have faith, and I'm glad that some of my friends do. It really is nice to see someone having a crisis say that they prayed, and knowing that that simple act made them feel that much better. Religion is good for people.

It is not good for me, though. If I ever prayed I would just feel so fake and demeaning to those people who do have faith, and thus make myself feel worse. I'm pretty content in my heresy and would like to stay that way. As far as things like this go, I'd just like to be left alone. I don't chase you around trying to convince you that your beliefs are a crock of crap, so please be kind enough to return the favor.

Oh, by the way, I do still celebrate Easter. Not for any kind of religious rebirth, though: I just really love to eat Cadbury Creme Eggs and paint real ones: that I do have faith in.

Indie Film Director Speaks: American Gypsy Dellal at HC

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Tonight, the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies brings a very special treat to the five-college area. Jasmine Dellal will be present to introduce the film that she directed American Gypsy: A Stranger in Everybody's Land. The event is part of the on-going Multicultural Film Festival. This is the seventh year that the program has been presented in the area.

American Gypsy: A Stranger in Everybody's Land is a documentary from the United States. The film is advertised as "a journey that takes the audience into the little known, but culturally rich, world of the one million American Gypsies (Rom) thorough the story of Jimmy Marks, a flamboyant Rom in the American Northwest who becomes passionately obsessed with a decade-long civil rights battle to defend his family and his culture."

Over the past seven years, the Multicultural Film Festival has had gained quite a bit of success. The festival has historically offered one credit for Five College students who attend a specified number of events. The program is certainly an excellent way to take a break from classes and learn what is truly going on in contemporary film production around the world.

The seventh annual Multicultural Film Festival has showcased such exceptional films as Slam, a critically acclaimed spoken word film from 1998 that has gained quite a bit of success in the United States. On Monday April 24th, the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies plans to bring acclaimed filmmaker Pratibha Parmar to Smith College to discuss her films that deal with gender and political issues. They will also screen her film A Place of Rage.

On Tuesday April 18th, the Russian film The Prince is Back will be shown at Amherst College. To present the film, the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies welcomes the director, Marina Goldovskaya. On Wednesday May 3rd, the Program will present the Cuban film, Life is to Whistle, and the Multicultural Film Festival will wrap up on Wednesday May 10th with Tired Companions, a German/Yugoslav co-production. The final two events of the program will both take place at Herter Auditorium on the UMass campus at 8 p.m.

Tonight's evening with Jasmine Dellas will begin at 8 p.m. at the Main Lecture Hall, Franklin Patterson at Hampshire College. As are all of the events that the Multicultural Film Festival sponsors, tonight's presentation will be free of charge for everyone who wants to attend. For more information on the Seventh Annual Multi-Cultural Film Festival contact the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies at 545-3659.

Women's magazine Too Simple

By Peter Carlson
The Washington Post

Real Simple is a new women's magazine designed to help "simplify every aspect of your life," and it's worth noting right off the bat that one way it suggests to achieve the blessed state of blissful simplicity is to buy a simple wool T-shirt for $365. Another way is to buy a simple cotton wrap skirt for $380. A third way is to buy a pair of simple cotton trousers for $590.

This is the kind of simplicity only the rich can afford, and Real Simple is the kind of magazine only the foolish would buy.

The magazine is put out by those wise, simple, spiritual folks at Time Warner, the multinational, multimedia mega-conglomerate that recently demonstrated its dedication to the small-is-beautiful ethos of simplicity by merging with another mega-conglomerate, America Online.

The founding editor of Real Simple is Susan Wyland, who spent three years as editor of Martha Stewart Living, a magazine that encourages women to make their lives Real Complicated by doing stuff like decorating their window boxes with slipcovers made of birch twigs or crafting Christmas wreaths made of acorns covered with velvet.

The urge to simplify is, of course, a wise one, and American writers have been advocating the simple life since at least 1854, when Henry David Thoreau published "Walden," an account of the two years he spent living in a shack he built on Walden Pond.

There are echoes of Thoreau in Real Simple – very faint echoes. The famously underemployed Thoreau joked that his real job was as "self-appointed inspector of snow storms and rain storms." And sure enough, Real Simple's choice for the first of its monthly Small Pleasures features is "walking in the rain." Four pages of artsy photos and gooey prose, it has to be one of the most inadvertently hilarious articles ever published in an American magazine.

In very big type, there's a poetic ode to the joys of walking in precipitation: "Veiled by rain (weep and who will see you?), muffled by rain (sing and who will judge?), you are freer than on a sunny day." Then, in small type, there's a guide to stuff you can buy to facilitate this formerly simple pleasure: "The nylon trench coat, $78, from Lands' End... Sharper Image's Windefyer umbrella... $30."

On the final page, poetry and advertising merge into a seamless tapestry of pure kitsch: "After a while, you come in from the wet and brew yourself a good cup of tea. Even before the first sip, its hot fragrance warms your insides. Todd & Holland Tea Merchants sells the best grades of tea."

Return of the Ruff Writer

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

Yes now! The Ruff Writer has returned. As a celebratory acknowledgement of my debatable union with the written word, I have assembled a compact bundle of cheers and jeers for the times. Here goes...

First and unquestionably foremost, cheers to Mos Def, that infallibly important Brooklyn emcee. Since solidifying his gold record Black on Both Sides in December, the Mighty Mos has channeled his well-achieved notoriety and incandescent skills into a penetrating voice of social activism. In January he issued a formal statement to the Michigan legislature regarding Nathaniel Abraham, who at 13-years-old, is the youngest murder defendant in US history.

His words, while unsympathetic to the charges, ignited a myriad of thought-provoking dialogue concerning the consequences of callously criminalizing urban youth.

A month later, Mos organized a musical movement and foundation, called Hip-Hop For Respect, which protests the Diallo shooting and unthinkable judicial verdict thereafter. The initial track from HHFR, "One Four Love, Part 1," featuring Talib Kweli, Common, Pharaohe Monch, Posdnous among others, overviews violence and police brutality and amalgamates the rap community with an issue of national consequence. Later this month, Mighty is teaming up with Def and the Pharcyde in a benefit concert for breast cancer awareness. As a truly militant and political figure, Mos implores himself and his mic as a weapon for peace and progression. All praises due...

Jeers to the Ruff Ryder camp. Boston's Made Men and the negativity starved News Stations that reported on the colossal brawl between the two crews. In yet another assault to the sanctity of hip-hop culture, the media has once again force-fed our populous with imagery linking rap shows to bloodshed. Although hostile, misogynistic energy is a staple of the Ruff Ryders/ Cash Money tour, the module of violence, which feverishly broke out at the Fleet Center last Tuesday night, is not a reflection of hip-hop. Let us all work together to overcome the few (yet highly publicized) detriments that cripple the succession of positivity within the rap community. "Ya caan brainwash we wit cha propatics, nin?"

Cheers, to Jay-Z. I cannot refrain from this confession. At one time (during the primitive days of my journalistic career) I considered Jigga the single biggest gravitational force that was pulling rap through the frenzied trenches of commercialization. Now, the incomparable Shawn Carter has turned the tables on his critiques and fruitfully silenced dem all. Even the most finicky underground heads cannot front on his lyrical ferocity and haughty maturity. Oddly enough, Jiggaman has resurrected and conceivably inspired his beat makers (Timbaland, Swizz Beats) to orchestrate some of their best work around his flow. Needless to say (despite Def Jam's idiotically audacious publicity department), the Life and Times of S Carter and the unreleased masterpiece "Anything," are still some of the hottest auditory flavors of this young year. (Now can a get my promos please!!!)

Jeers, to the so considered "edgy urban movement" of the now. Since hip-hop caught flames throughout the world of fashion and pop media, there has been a front-lash of fused genres and confused interpretations of music and style. Dedicated to the shape-shifting cats who copped the Black Star album (after it marginally blew up), learned that it was an offering that traveled against the mainstream grain, decided at that very moment to ditch their strings, malodorous dread-knots, patch-sewn corduroys and bootleg Phish tapes, and join this hipster society of rap followers before it becomes less hip, excess jeers.

To the fraudulently mechanical kids and cliques who clad themselves in Echo-type gear, turn their hats slightly to the left or right, and wallow in a superficial personification of a hoodwinked aesthetic, you're playing yourselves. This is not to say that the hip-hop community is not about love, because it is. But it is also about realism, originality and, most importantly, contribution. Every now and then ask yourself what you are doing for the movement besides attempting to look like you belong to it. In the words of the "(other) Large Professor," "be someone, not someone else."

Like Anthony Hopkins mingling with the gorillas in the movie Instinct, culture ought to be studied, observed and deeply internalized before it is embodied.

COURTESY FOX TELEVISION

We're all over 35!!!

Speaking of playing oneself, cheers to Beverly Hills 90210 and my nuptial addition to watching it dutifully. It has been a long and at times, gruesomely painful run of horrifically exquisite television, and as it approaches the final lap, it is time to wave adieu. One reason to watch every last episode: Dylan McKay. His smooth, one-liner savvy ness and watertight demeanor rules the show. Eventually, before the curtain falls, Dyls will successfully woo his one-liner spouting counterpart and lifelong love interest Kelly Taylor, and if you haven't figured it out yet (or simply don't give a %#@!), you heard it here... Kelly and Dylan and Donna and David will exchange vows.

Plus, if we're really, really lucky, we might even get to see Brandon Walsh make one last appearance at the wedding. Hmmmmm...

Lastly, cheers to that backpacker emcee Encore and his producer, the Architect. Finally, here is a duo with some underground eminence. As a truly independent group without industry affiliation or established rap connections, they have set themselves apart from the "pack" by exemplifying coherent creativity through their chemistry. Considered by some as the air apparent successors to Guru and Primo, Core and Test (and the LP Self Preservation) are fit for subterranean denotation. Check the singles "-084" and "Sporadic" for further evidence.

That's all for me...everyting is everyting.

good cup of tea. Even before the first sip, its hot fragrance warms your insides. Todd & Holland Tea Merchants sells the best grades of tea."

One of the most delightfully comic aspects of Real Simple is its propensity for stating the stupefyingly obvious as if revealing a cosmic truth for the first time. For instance, novelist Francine Prose writes about how she and her husband once nearly ran out of gas in rural Vermont, a frightening episode that taught her a valuable life lesson she calls "The Three-Quarters Rule" When your gas tank – or your milk bottle – is three-quarters empty, you should buy more.

"My suspicion is that, if we follow it consciously and carefully enough," she writes, "the Three-Quarters Rule may turn out to be one of those principles (go on green, stop on red) that we eventually internalize and act on without having to think about much."

The Duh! factor reaches its apogee in an article called "why portion size alters," which manages to spend three pages explaining that if you eat smaller portions, you won't get so fat.

Among the many people who don't need to read the Real Simple article titled "The Fastest, Easiest Way to Clean Your Bathroom" is Barbara Ehrenreich.

"It's a different world down there below knee level," she writes. "Here you find elaborate dust structures held together by a scaffolding of dog hair; dried bits of pasta glued to the floor by their sauce; the congealed remains of grapes, jellies, contraceptive creams..."

The work is tough and the pay is lousy. Ehrenreich got only about $5 an hour, although the people whose houses she cleaned were paying $25 an hour for her services. But what really bothers Ehrenreich is what the recent rise in the employment of maids signifies. The Brahmanization of America. "We are dividing along the lines of traditional Latin American societies – into a tiny overclass and a huge underclass, with the latter available to perform intimate household services for the former."

Treatment still possible for Stottlemyre

By Delthia Ricks
Newsday

Several intriguing areas of research are improving life expectancy and quality of life for patients with multiple myeloma, a type of cancer of the blood afflicting New York Yankees pitching coach Mel Stottlemyre.

Specialists and patient advocates said Monday the aim behind new studies is to provide effective treatments for a disease that can be difficult to fight. It strikes an estimated 14,000 people annually.

"The five-year survival rate is not that high compared with other forms of cancer," said Kathy Giusti, president of the Multiple Myeloma Research Foundation in New Canaan, Conn. "For multiple myeloma it is only 25 percent, so that means only 25 percent of the people diagnosed in any given year will be alive five years after that diagnosis."

Giusti was diagnosed with the disease four years ago and has been on drug therapy since that time to keep the cancer in remission.

Stottlemyre was first diagnosed with multiple myeloma a year ago during spring training. his diagnosis coming as the result of a routine physical. Even though he returns to work Tuesday, he will be on chemotherapy, awaiting a bone marrow transplant in six months.

Initial symptoms of multiple myeloma often are so subtle, Giusti said, that some people might easily dismiss them as something else. A nagging infection may be written off as a lingering bout with the flu; deep bone pain may be dismissed as an old, intractable athletic injury.

The disease affects the plasma cells of the blood, which develop in the bone marrow. Plasma cells are key components of the immune response, doctors say, and normally produce proteins known as immunoglobulins (also known as antibodies) that destroy infections and other invaders that enter the body.

In multiple myeloma, the DNA in myeloma cells somehow becomes damaged, leading to a proliferation of cells that are incapable of proper function.

Infection-fighting capability is impaired for people with the cancer, and because the cells originate in the bone marrow, the bones themselves develop lesions, soft spots that develop into holes in the bone.

Giusti said doctors increasingly recommend bone marrow transplants for multiple myeloma.

Before a bone marrow transplant, patients undergo a treatment with a super lethal dose of chemotherapy to wipe out all cancer-causing cells. That treatment is followed with an infusion of bone marrow, the patient's own or from a donor.

Other promising treatments include thalidomide, cancer vaccine therapy and a class of drugs known as bisphosphonates. Giusti said. Bisphosphonates help rebuild bones and fortify their density.

Patients are counseled that they will have to think of multiple myeloma as a chronic disease, much in the way diabetes is chronic and must be continually treated for patients to remain alive, said Stephanie Stoss, coordinator for the multiple myeloma treatment program at St. Vincent's Comprehensive Cancer Center in Manhattan.

"People with multiple myeloma can go back to work, they're in the workforce," Stoss said. "We tell patients that while their disease is not curable, it is treatable."

Thalidomide, once thought of as a horrific drug because of resulting birth defects in expectant mothers who took the drug in the late 1950s and 1960s, has now made a comeback as a treatment for several forms of cancer, including multiple myeloma.

Swearing book out to stop salty speaking

By Jim Shea
The Hartford Courant

Swearing, first-rate swearing, is an art.

It is a unique form of expression in which the practitioner is bounded solely by his or her ability to weave off-color language into an often stunningly original tapestry.

Sadly, however, the medium has been taken over by a paint-by-numbers crowd that is totally lacking in creativity, nuance and, most annoyingly, discretion.

Jim O'Connor is out to change that.

The Illinois public-relations executive wants to curb the pervasive cursing that he says has wagged and wiggled its salty-tongue way into every corner of our culture.

To this end he has written a book called "Cuss Control: The Complete Book on How To Curb Your Cursing" (Three Rivers Press, $12.95).

"Swearing is just so commonplace these days," O'Connor says. "No matter where you go – in the office, walking down the street, watching television, at the ballpark and especially in the movies – you hear it all the time.

"I think more people are offended by swearing than we think. That's because it is rare for someone to go up to someone else and ask them not to swear. So, as a consequence, people tend to think it is all right. But I don't think swearing is accepted as much as it is tolerated."

It might be tempting to dismiss O'Connor as just some crusading blankety-blank goody two-shoes. He has, after all, done some 400 radio interviews as well as several television shows, including "The Oprah Winfrey Show."

But in conversation he comes across as even-keeled, rational, down to earth and possessing an ess-sense of humor.

Most important, he is not one of those people who has seen the light and come away with a mission to make sure everyone else is properly illuminated.

"I'm not a big preacher," O'Connor says. "There is nothing you can do about other people's swearing. You have to be concerned about yourself."

And just what of O'Connor?

"I think recovering is a good word to use in regard to me," O'Connor says. "I still swear from time to time, but I try to be more discreet about it. Usually no one hears me, but if they do, it doesn't matter. I'm just trying to break the habit."

O'Connor says he was inspired to write "Cuss Control" after making the decision to curb his own cursing.

"I decided I was going to stop swearing, but I found it was a difficult habit to break. So I had to figure out how to do it, and I thought there were probably other people out there who wished they didn't swear. And seeing there were no books on the subject, I decided I would be the one to write one."

While O'Connor concedes that most people today will probably not complain if you swear, that doesn't mean they are not judging you.

"Your choice of words determines whether you are viewed as mature, intelligent, polite and pleasant or rude, crude, insensitive and abrasive," O'Connor says.

O'Connor divides swearing into two categories: casual and causal.

"I think casual swearing is the more defensible of the two," he says, "because it is usually provoked by an emotion and is very hard to resist. Casual swearing is just lazy language. You just do it out of habit without even trying to think of a better word. This often projects a negative attitude. It's not just the words but the attitude behind them that also reflects poorly on your personality."

Because of this relationship, O'Connor says, one key to breaking the cussing habit is learning to cope with situations – to be more patient, more tolerant. He points to his own driving as an example.

"I think this is the one area in which I have made the most improvement," he says. "Men, in general, tend to take driving personally. You know, 'That guy cut me off! Well, he didn't cut you off, he cut your car off.

"Something like that happens to me now, I let it go. Same thing with traffic. If you've considered all the alternative routes, what else are you going to do? So just sit back, talk to the person you are with, listen to the radio."

In terms of the generational divide, O'Connor says youths today are more foul-mouthed than ever.

"Kids today are growing up in a cursing culture," O'Connor says. "They hear it among their friends, in the movies, on cable and network television. Many even hear it coming from their parents. It is difficult for them to see anything wrong with it when they hear it everywhere they turn.

"I speak at a lot of high schools, and when I ask the kids how many of them swear, 90 to 95 percent of them raise their hands. When I ask how many of their parents swear, 60 to 70 percent raise their hands. When I ask about their grandparents, it's about 40 percent."

If there is a weak point in O'Connor's quest for less potty mouth, it rests in his advocacy for using substitute words for curse words. If, for example, one says bullspit in place of the obvious curse word, does not a listener still think of the obvious curse word?

O'Connor agrees that is probably the case, but adds, "I still think it is better than the actual swear. Instead of saying 'bull,' why not say 'bunkum' or 'balderdash'? It softens the effect significantly."

While having no illusions about totally eliminating cursing – the book's title is, after all, "Cuss Control" – O'Connor believes a significant dent can be made.

"We are almost at the saturation point in regard to swearing, and I think the book is helping to create an awareness that wasn't there before," he says. "I know a lot of people receive this book anonymously. Someone buys it for them, and it makes them think.

"Take ethnic slurs. We've definitely reduced the number you hear now. They've become politically incorrect. So there's hope."

of the park. Last year against old friend Steve Avery (yes, that infamous guy who was suppose to replace Clemens), Everett hit a two-run homer to tie a game against the Reds.

In 1999, when his old team needed a clutch hit in the late innings (.348 average, six homers and 82 RBI with runners in scoring position), Everett came through with a hit. He finished the season with 25 homers, 108 RBI and a .325 batting average.

"Carl Everett was one of the best clutch hitters in the National League," said General Manager Dan Duquette on the Red Sox website. "He has outstanding ability hitting in the middle of the order and is a solid middle of the diamond player as a centerfielder."

If this doesn't excite you, then I don't know what will. Either way, as long as Everett works hard and stays healthy he will not regress, but rather progress into a top-notch center fielder. He might be just what the Red Sox need to get to the next level, someone who can hit, run, field, lead and most important, protect Nomar Garciaparra and Troy O'Leary.

Only time will tell if that breath-taking smell of wood and those crazy cheers of fans will be here to stay.

After a long road to his stardom, Jagr finally ready to lead Penguins

By William Gildea
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – During the last fine time in Pittsburgh Penguins history, the tall and long-armed and totally graceful Jaromir Jagr skated as dangerously free as he often still does. This was Game 1 of the 1992 Stanley Cup finals against the Chicago Black Hawks. The Penguins trailed 4-3 in the final minutes. Suddenly, Jagr reached out and stole a pass deep in the Penguins' portion of the ice and rushed the other way, the puck dancing on the end of his stick.

He slid the puck between one defenseman's legs, faked his way past another, bluffed a shot and then slid a backhander under goaltender Ed Belfour. Jagr had tied the game. With only 12.6 seconds remaining, his mentor, Mario Lemieux won it. From that morale-breaking victory, the Penguins went on to sweep the Black Hawks for their second, and most recent, Stanley Cup. Lemieux gave all the credit to Jagr for his end-to-end burst that put the Penguins in position to win. "That," Lemieux said then, "was the sweetest goal I've ever seen."

Jagr and Lemieux still are making music together, having combined in a different way to lead the Penguins into another postseason and once more into the Washington Capitals' path. One of the greatest scorers ever, Lemieux recently made the most dramatic save in Penguins' history. Forced into premature retirement in 1997 from the effects of Hodgkin's disease, the Hall of Famer saved a bankrupt franchise for Pittsburgh last September by buying the club. He's the club's owner and chairman of the board. For the Capitals, better that he be in the owner's box for their best-of-seven series, beginning Thursday night at MCI Center.

Jagr still is Jagr, almost a second Lemieux on the ice. He came back from thigh and hamstring injuries March 20 with a sensational performance that beat the New York Rangers, 5-4 – he scored two goals in 45 seconds and assisted on the other three goals. Last Thursday, he scored twice and assisted once in a 4-2 victory at Toronto that secured a playoff berth for the Penguins. On Sunday, he became the NHL points champion for the third straight season and fourth time in all. He totaled 96 points, on 42 goals and 54 assists, despite missing 19 games, almost a quarter of the season, because of various injuries. He's best in big games, even when not totally healthy.

At 28, Jagr is the 6-foot-2, 234-pound finished product that the late Jack Button, as Capitals director of player personnel, glimpsed in its infancy. Button traveled in the 1980s to what now is the Czech Republic. Jagr comes from the town of Kladno, 30 miles northwest of Prague. "You couldn't take your eyes off him," Button said after returning from his trip to evaluate the teen prodigy, then with flowing hair (now shorn). "You didn't have to be a genius to see how strong he is and how fast he is. And super hands – great quickness with both hands and wrists."

He's a born hockey sniper with rosy cheeks. Looks can deceive.

He's the third Jaromir Jagr, following his grandfather and father, and takes his ruggedness from them. The eldest Jagr was a farmer, who under communist control had his fields collectivized. For refusing to work on a cooperative farm, he spent three years in jail. Jaromir grew up in the family farmhouse and learned an appreciation of history. He wears number 68 on his sweater in memory of the year Soviet tanks rolled into Prague and the year his grandfather died.

As a boy, Jagr idolized Lemieux and Ronald Reagan. He kept a photo of Reagan in his school copybook because he had heard that Reagan spoke out against communism. When Reagan heard that story several years ago, he phoned Jagr, who thought it was a hoax and hung up on Reagan's secretary. She called back and assured him it was Reagan calling. Reagan thanked Jagr for speaking often about the United States to his young peers when he was growing up.

Jagr was on the ice at age three. His father, who held an administrative job at Kladno's coalmine, wanted him to be a hockey player. He gave Jagr his first stick and had him involved in three leagues by the time he was six. He played the equivalent of street hockey on the dirt yard between the family farmhouse and barn, scattering the chickens his mother kept. His father started his son's strengthening program with homemade barbells, made from the axle of an old tractor and two slabs of iron.

Today Jagr drives black Mercedes convertible, and other luxury cars, and makes $10.4 million a season.

He is further pleased to be working not only under Lemieux but also countryman Ivan Hlinka, the Penguins' associate head coach who was head coach of the 1998 Olympic champion Czech Republic team. Hlinka is heir apparent to Penguins Coach Herb Brooks. Eastern European players surround Jagr on the Penguins. And so while he still prefers life in Prague and Kladno for the privacy, he hasn't been terribly taxed to adopt Pittsburgh.

With his skating skill and blurry shots, he makes the Penguins oddly imposing for a .500 team, and a chore for the Capitals to play. A reluctant interviewee and a reluctant take-charge guy on the team, Jagr turned surprisingly outspoken among Pittsburgh reporters Monday when he unequivocally – although somewhat tardily – accepted the mantle of leadership on the Penguins. Heretofore, he had been content as brilliant soloist.

And Carmen Electra, too.

– The Laker girls. Every team needs Laker girls. Why do you think Jack Nicholson has season tickets?

– The Orlando Magic's John Amaechi, a native of Great Britain, has a cup of tea before and after every shoot-around on game days. Why not implement a mandatory Tea Time? It might not do a lot for player's individual performances. (Amaechi is averaging 10.4 ppg) but it definitely will enhance the NBA's locker-room Parliamentary gossip.

– More lights (relatively speaking). To anyone who saw Chris Childs and Bryant's almost-fight earlier this month, I am glad that we were able to share a laugh. I mean the last time I saw a pathetic floundering to that extent was when Peter "The Hurricane" McNeeley knocked heads with Mike Tyson.

And those are only the obvious things.

I don't think anyone can argue the fact that the NBA is lackluster. But, if I weren't such a die-hard basketball junkie, then I really wouldn't care that the Lakers are humiliating their opponents this year while O'Neal strides to his first MVP award. And, I also wouldn't care that the Celtics are horrific or that Miami Heat center Alonzo Mourning was named the NBA Player-of-the-Week. Don't worry. I'll still watch, now and then. I like to poke fun at the best basketball in the world. So what. They're the best and I respect that. I admit that, at times, it's even fun to watch. I'll be happier when the playoffs come around and Pitino gets the shaft.

I'm just going to end this column with a quote by CBS' Billy Packer. "Mateen Cleeves is the best player in Michigan State History." I won't even make the obvious comment.

Dallas is only one of three major runners for the cup

By Helene Elliott
Los Angeles Times

For every reason to pick the Dallas Stars to repeat as Stanley Cup champions, there's a reason to think they can't win again.

Goalie Ed Belfour tied Buffalo's Dominik Hasek for the NHL's best save percentage, .919. The Stars' penalty killing was the NHL's best, 89.5 percent. They topped 100 points for the fourth consecutive season, a franchise record. They've been through this grind before.

"We know what it takes to step it up for the playoffs," center Mike Modano said. "The experience we gained last year can take us a long way. We had to go through it firsthand to understand it. We know what buttons to push."

But ...

Ice Nieuwendyk's balky back acted up last week, giving him painful spasms. Defenseman Sergei Zubov, a catalyst on the power play, is sidelined indefinitely because of a knee injury. Winger Jere Lehtinen, twice the Selke winner as the top defensive forward, played only 17 games because of ankle problems. He returned in the season finale, but the Stars finished with a 0-3-2 streak and raised questions about their readiness to defend their title.

"We're certainly going to have to play a lot better than we're playing right now," Coach Ken Hitchcock said last week. "This is not something everybody wants... We're not playing well five-on-five and we're not playing very physical at all."

Said winger Kirk Muller, "You don't want to get into a turn-it-on and turn-it-off type of thing. We've got enough veterans here to know what we have to do. It's mental. This team has a lot of great players, but a lot of success comes from commitment and how hard you work day in and day out."

And for every reason to pick the Detroit Red Wings – including Sergei Fedorov's stellar play and Brendan Shanahan's fifth season with at least 40 goals – there are reasons for caution. Those include the sprained knee that idled team captain Steve Yzerman the last four games and the injured cheekbone defenseman Chris Chelios suffered last Friday.

The same questions apply to Colorado, which won its last eight games but will play several weeks without center Peter Forsberg, who separated his right shoulder in a meaningless game last Friday. Even St. Louis hasn't been immune. The Blues, who rode an exceptional team defense and the spectacular goaltending of Roman Turek to the NHL's best record, will open without top scorer Pavol Demitra, who has a concussion. In addition, Turek must prove himself in his NHL playoff debut.

"The four best teams are St. Louis, Dallas, Detroit and Colorado," said Terry Crisp, who coached the Calgary Flames to the Stanley Cup in 1989 and is now a broadcaster. "All four of those teams have a good solid defensive system in place. They can shut you down. That makes them so much more complete than the other teams.

"It's not like you can say, 'It's Dallas' offense against St. Louis' defense.' All these teams are so evenly matched. Normally you'd say, 'Their goaltending is a question.' Now you say, 'Is Turek going to stay hot? Will Belfour go cold? Is (Colorado's) Patrick Roy the Patrick Roy of old?'"

The picture is similarly fuzzy in the East.

The Philadelphia Flyers erased a 15-point deficit and overtook the New Jersey Devils for first place in the Atlantic Division and first in the East, but there's no telling how rookie Brian Boucher will handle his playoff starting assignment. There's also Eric Lindros' absence for the first round. Will his criticism of the team's treatment of his concussion fracture the Flyers' units or bond them with General Manager Bob Clarke, who stripped Lindros of the captaincy? Coach Roger Neilson is still recovering from cancer treatment but may return for the second round – if the Flyers get there.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're more interested in what you can get today than what you can give, but a close friend in need should be able to turn you around.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You'll attract into your orbit today those who share much in the way of outlook and ambition. You can learn a lot from watching them work.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Avoid being overzealous when it comes to routine business around the house, or over-indulgence at the dinner table. Moderation is the key.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Give a little more of yourself today and you'll be in the position to receive a little more from others tomorrow. Share and share alike!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – It'll be up to you today to come to a reasonable interpretation of the facts and to convince others that your solution is accurate.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – It's not going to be all fun and games today, for a heavy burden is likely to be place on your shoulders before nightfall. Concentrate!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – The more you try to second-guess a rival, the more likely you are to be disappointed in your own performance today. Be sincere; play it straight.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You can be innovative and original today, even when you are tending to things that are routine and mundane. You can even have a little fun, too!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You've been wrestling with a decision that is not as hard as you've been making it. Listen to the advice of a friend; take the high road.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – A complex issue is likely to be illuminated in an unusual manner today, giving you a new and improved opportunity to address it appropriately.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Avoid crowds today. Seek out solitude whenever you feel yourself becoming a slave to your own emotions. Conflict is best left to others.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Don't be overly critical today – particularly when a Libra or Cancer native is only trying to give you a helping hand.

Storming Back

After a slow start, UMass softball has turned on the heat to win eight of its last ten games

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

In her 20 years at the helm of the Massachusetts softball program, Elaine Sortino had never coached a home game anywhere else except Totman Field, until this spring.

In the last four years, with Danielle Henderson on the mound, she never had to worry about a pitching jam, until this spring.

Sortino always had depth to cover for injuries, until this spring.

She was used to her Minutewomen dominating teams in the Northeast, until this spring.

Sense a pattern?

That's because, for the first time in the modern era of UMass softball success, Sortino has never had a younger team, or a more-injured team in the early going.

Just three weeks ago, she didn't even have a proven No. 1 pitcher. And when the Minutewomen started the 2000 season 0-9 after trips to Phoenix and Atlanta, and when the domino effect ran its course, the panic button looked more like a falling lever.

"I had depth at every position (before some injuries), but now we're skinny as the day is long," Sortino said, aware that her squad's record was a bit misleading, given the progress she felt it was making.

UMass Softball Notebook

But then came the calm after the storm. UMass marched into the Speedline Invitational Tournament in Southern Florida and won three of five games. The dominoes, Sortino said, were beginning to fall in the other direction.

Next was a tournament in Tallahassee, Fla., where the Minutewomen won four of six, including their final two contests. Sortino finally had the group she was looking for. Her team wasn't as bad as everyone thought. And after a closer look at the numbers, it actually compared to some of her more successful groups.

"People don't remember the 97 season, the 96 season, and the 98 season. Our numbers aren't that far off," she said, referring to other teams that started slowly. "The thing that really hurt us was the Atlanta deal. We went 1-5. And that brought us a couple of notches down from being prepared for [our next trip to] Florida."

But almost overnight, the Minutewomen ran their once-poor record to a confident 15-18 overall. Sortino's younger players settled in quickly, and she found her pitching ace: freshman Kailia Holtz. It was the momentum from a two-week layoff between the Tallahassee tournament and the home opener that made the difference.

"Psychologically, we came off that trip feeling much better about ourselves than we had in all our previous trips," Sortino said. "Then by design, we took the two weeks, knowing that we'd have a huge laundry list of things that we needed to clean up and get ready."

After a 25-game road-swing to begin the year, UMass returned home to a new stadium that appropriately signified the new era. A program once driven by senior leadership had converted itself into upstart unit of underclassmen.

In addition to the emergence of Holtz, sophomores Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler and Teri Rooney have become cornerstones to a young, and very dangerous UMass team. Arguably producing the squad's most balanced hitting, the second-year duo has helped the Minutewomen win eight of their last 10 games, including a split with favored Virginia Tech.

And as freshman first baseman Brandi Cross continues to terrorize opposing pitchers – with already three home runs this spring – Sortino feels that her team's days of losing are finally over. Actually, she hasn't given her players much of a choice.

"We've endured about as many losses as we can take," she said, candidly.

With hardly any experience, this youthful Minutewoman squad looks frightening. Sortino starts her only senior, catcher Nikki Faessler, and uses only one junior regularly on the field other than pitcher Carrie Jeffries. Four of her five freshman start, as well as three of her four sophomores.

And despite an obvious lack of experience, UMass may have one of the most underrated teams of Sortino's tenure.

"This is the best defensive team I've ever coached," she said.

While pitching was an early-season problem for the Minutewomen, Holtz, Jeffries and sophomore Jen Hadley have collectively improved the team's earned run average, taking a significant amount of pressure off Sortino's young – and often inconsistent – batting order.

Poised to pad its win column, UMass will next play Saturday at noon, when it hosts Atlantic 10 foe St. Joseph's for a doubleheader.

While young stars shine, NBA still dim until playoffs unfold

New stars like Kevin Garnett, left, have stepped into the foreground of NBA prominence, leaving veterans like John Stockton, right, to simply watch.

It's April, March Madness is long gone, and I'm bored. Sure, baseball has begun and I know I'm supposed to be all "woo-hoo" about Pedro Martineniz and the Red Sox, but I'm not.

Lately, the most interesting thing in sports has been Tiger Woods not winning the Masters... life just ain't fair! I'm not ashamed to say that I'm a huge golf fan, but even that's not doing it for me right now. We all know there's nothing better than college basketball. That doesn't even need to be said. But what else is there? Oh yeah, the good ol' NBA.

Eric Soderstrom

Dennis Rodman is gone and the masterful Rick Pitino has done as good a job as a dead man. Let's just accept that, Celtics fans. But, before you say, "Ugh, I hate the NBA, it's so boring, blah blah blah," let me explain why "the league" has definite potential to supply some bizarre amusement to even the most apathetic individual.

So, Commissioner David Stern, if you happen to come across this column in the next week or so, please take my ideas into tremendous consideration for it will create an instant blizzard of interest in your league. Plus, I don't care if you take credit for them. Just get it done.

Here are my ideas:

– Find some way to give Utah Jazz's point guard John Stockton some jumping ability. If you can do it surgically, fine. But if you can't, then peek into that vast cave of United States technology and create some sneakers that will launch him above the rim. Hmmm... Stockton doing a windmill jam in the face of Kevin Garnett. Hey, that's enough to get me to watch every night.

– Bobby Knight. Get him a pro-coaching job now. Preferably, I would like to see him replace Jeff Van Gundy in New York. It's time to see Latrell Sprewell struggle to pry two squeezing hands from his neck. In addition, Knight is the only one who has the guts to tell Patrick Ewing to stop playing. I know for a fact that I'm not the only one sick of seeing him keep that long arm of his in the air for three minutes after every made jumper (After his recharged performance last week, however, it's pretty much guaranteed that we'll have to see Patrick for at least another year or two).

–Do you remember the ABA? Well if you do, then you remember the red, white, and blue ball that they used. It looks better. Bring it back.

– Speaking of the ABA, we need more Afros. Afros, Afros, and more Afros. We all know Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal have potential. Maybe it's time for an Afro-enforcement type rule, kind of like the tuck-in-your-shirt rule. Nothing looks better than an unyielding Afro. Good job by Keith Closs for his. Too bad he plays for the Clippers.

– The L.A. Clippers. Let's just put it this way: yuck. Lose 'em.

– The trade deadline. Get rid of it.

– At the end of the regular season, allow teams to temporarily sign players from those teams who fail to make the playoffs. Post-season moves would, in the least, liven-up the first couple of rounds. The finals would be like a competitive All-Star game. How can that not be interesting?

– Except in Michael Jordan's case, when a player retires, don't let him come back. Yes, Kevin Johnson (He's back), this applies to you.

– Remove Jordan from his General Manager position with the Washington Wizards. Nike isn't there this time to help him with this project.

– Clone Rodman. More than once.

Play Ball: season finally opens at Fenway for the Red Sox

This Boston team is good, but really, how good?

Finally we know that the Red Sox will probably win more than 20 percent of their games... now that they've shown they can score runs when Pedro's not pitching. Whew.

Of course, they did it yesterday against the lowly Twins, but there's nothing like a crappy home-opening opponent to jumpstart a stalling squad.

Picked by some to return to the post-season, and by others to even win the whole shah-bang (they're idiots), Boston, like last year, will have to fight for that Wild Card spot. There's no way the Yankees will fold with their polished pitching and their big-game savvy.

So Sox fans, wake up, please. Boston is a good team, a well-managed team, and at times, an overachieving team. They can play with anyone, and can beat anyone with their ace on the hill. But as games two through five showed us, they could very well lose to anyone too.

BOSTON RED SOX
Aaron Saykin

For at least a day, they'll take the charity win. But there are larger problems... ehem, like their pitiful four-game losing streak that just ended Sunday courtesy Pedro. In his first start, el hermano Ramon pitched as good as Walter Matthau looks.

And Brian Rose ought not sever his Pawtucket ties. He's pitching more like a tulip than anything else.

Above all, this Red Sox team – which for some reason has Sports Illustrated wired like a billboard – needs some serious work before October. And the pitching isn't the only thing to work on.

How about some consistent offense, Jose Offerman? Sound good to you? A switch hitter like you salivates over that wall in left field. But how about some hits on the road from the leadoff spot?

Troy O'Leary, always a trooper, is playing through Tony Pena Syndrome... i.e. not being able to bat his weight.

It's unrealistic to think that these bats won't come alive. They're playoff tested. The problem is that, while 13 runs are nice, the Sox never score 13 runs when they need 13 runs.

This is a fragile club they field this season. Expectations are through the roof, but Duquette gives them only second-floor talent. Kudos to Danny, though, for picking up Carl Everett. But Boston needs another arm in that rotation. And it shouldn't be Derek Lowe. He's too valuable in the pen.

What they really need is for everyone to cut them some slack so they can sneak up on the Yanks, not vice versa.

While Boston's singing, the Bronx still has the banner

With whom does the power lie in the American League East? The up-and-coming Boston Red Sox? The Baltimore Orioles? The Blue Jays? The Devil Rays? Not a chance.

Well, it may be too early to tell, but when the hype of the first week subsides, the Bronx Bombers should reign supreme once again. They still possess a pitching staff that is predominantly right-handed, but Andy Pettitte is the perfect mix in the middle of this staff.

Orlando Hernandez is a pure power pitcher; Roger Clemens has lost some pop on his fastball, but won two consecutive Cy Young Awards in 1997 and '98; the ageless arm of David Cone pitched a perfect game last year and is always good for 15 wins.

As if beating these aces was not hard enough, teams should fear the bullpen even more. When Joe Torre takes a late inning stroll to the mound it means that the Yanks will be adding another to win column. The main reason for this is the combination of setup man Ramiro Mendoza and closer Mariano Rivera. When this dynamic duo takes the mound (obviously not at the same time), opposing hitters seem to find a way to end up back on the bench as quickly as they stepped into the box.

Oh yeah, they don't call these guys the Bronx Bombers for nothing. They can mash with the best of them. They may not have as potent an offense as the Cleveland Indians, but that starting pitching it is no wonder why every almost every sportswriter in America has picked them to make a return trip to the fall classic.

Chuck Knoblauch had an off-year both at the plate and in the field last season, but it didn't seem to matter. Knoblauch brought a great track record with him when he came to the Bronx from Minnesota and everyone thought that he would be the next Joe Morgan with the small confines of Yankee Stadium. The power numbers although he never was one to hit 30 homers, have dropped, but when he gets on base, he scores.

The reason for this is Derek Jeter. Emerging as a legitimate MVP candidate every year he not only gives the Yankees a solid defensive shortstop, but a .340, 20 home run and 100 RBI man. The outfield platoon, even with the loss of Tim Raines is still one of the best in baseball with Bernie Williams as its anchor. Paul O'Neill is not too bad of a hitter, either.

Sox don't disappoint in home-opening victory

By Regan McKendry
Collegian Correspondent

After opening on the road for six games, it's always a good feeling to return home. And having your opponent be the Minnesota Twins certainly doesn't hurt either.

This was the good fortune of the Boston Red Sox who played their 100th home opener yesterday afternoon, defeating Minnesota by a score of 13-4. Many of the players were glad to return to the friendly confines of Fenway Park, especially as the Twins played the part of the sacrificial lamb.

The action for the Red Sox offense started quickly, as the first two batters reached base. Brian Daubach then hit a sacrifice fly to drive home Jose Offerman for the first Red Sox run. Nomar Garciaparra singled in Troy O'Leary before the inning was over, giving the Sox a 2-1 lead.

Twins	4
Red Sox	13

Anyone moving to Boston from the south sometimes has trouble adjusting to the area, and it's not just the odd accent. The high temperature in the city on opening day was 46 degrees. Carl Everett, though, had no problems adjusting to his new home. In his first at bat at Friendly Fenway he blasted a home run towards center field to lead of the second inning.

With the bases loaded, Trot Nixon walked to force Mike Stanley, Wilton Veras then crossed the plate as Daubach reached first on Twins pitcher Joe Mays throwing error.

Minnesota skipper Tom Kelly then pulled his man on the mound. Mays, who left plenty of damage on the base paths, was credited with seven earned runs in only one and a third innings pitched.

Relieved by Mike Redman, the Twins gave up five more runs in the second, two on a Garciaparra single. Both O'Leary and Jason Varitek each added an RBI in that frame.

With a nine-run cushion, Ramon Martinez had little trouble handling the Minnesota offense. He pitched five innings of five-hit baseball, striking out one and walking three. The only run given up by Martinez was in the first, after he walked Ron Coomer with the bases loaded.

John Wasdin and Rob Stanifer finished up the relief work. Wasdin gave up three runs over two innings. Stanifer, having just been called up that day to replace the injured Bryce Florie, allowed only one man to reach base in the final two innings.

Bargain shopping lands Sox a priceless Everett

Finally, the smell of timber and the reckless cheers are back in Beantown, baby. The Red Sox are at it again, and Carl Everett is the reason why.

It hasn't been easy beginning to the 2000 campaign for the Sox. After winning their first game of the season, Boston fell into a four game losing skid, hurt by a horrendous bluing slump.

However, things have begun to change over the last few games, thanks in large part to the off-season pick-up of switch hitter Carl "my man" Everett. Now Sox faithful have something to cheer about.

Everett's much-anticipated arrival had the people of Boston and the surrounding area talking about his flashy style of play, and comparing him to Freddy Lynn (the last great Red Sox center fielder) for weeks leading up to the season.

It didn't take long for Everett to make his mark. In his BoSox debut last week in Seattle, Everett went 1-3 with single in a Sox 2-0 victory.

Over the next six games Everett – who signed a three-year, $24 million contract with Boston before spring training – began to show the fans and his teammates his worth, batting a colossal .458 with four homeruns and seven RBI and leading the team on the field.

It has not always been a joyous ride for Everett. He came into the league in 1990 drafted by the Yankees (yes, the boss actually made a mistake) and was regarded as a weak hitter with an above average arm. Because of the supposed weaknesses – and some off field family problems – Everett bounced around from team to team. The Red Sox are his fifth team in ten years.

The last few years have been a learning and building phase for Everett. Carl has learned with patience to develop into a flawless hitter with a cobra-quick bat. He has shown that he is not – and will not – be intimidated by any opposing pitcher, whether it is Randy Johnson or Kevin Brown, whom faced often in the National League.

Point in reference, Everett sometimes bats lefty against a left-hander sinker-ball pitcher because he has become strong enough to turn on an inside pitch and rocket it out

SGA motions against cameras

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Last night's weekly meeting of the Student Government Association was a productive one by all accounts. As compared to last week's meeting, it was also much calmer. The SGA passed three motions, welcomed an almost entirely new executive cabinet to the senate and discussed last week's meeting.

The main motions debated on involved yesterday's announcement by Chancellor David K. Scott ordering security cameras be placed in Southwest. The decision came down after weekend fires during a power outage. Also blamed for the decision was the arrest of three UMass students in conjunction with a sexual assault.

SGA president Jeff Howe, who had made security cameras a major issue of his campaign, spoke extensively about the decision and authored two of the passed motions.

"Seth [Avakian, the SGA Trustee] and I have strong opinions about this issue and we have made that clear. Students don't support this initiative and the Chancellor chose to ignore that," Howe said. The two motions that he authored addressed the creation of a committee that would advise the Chancellor and the need for alternate options, including a community watch program, to be sought.

Addressing the first motion, which was debated in the Senate Chamber, Howe said that residence halls were private living area.

"Our constituency doesn't want this to happen, and we just want them to have input," Howe said. Concerned about where the cameras would be placed, Howe said the only guarantee that he had was that they wouldn't be placed in the residence hall bathrooms, meaning that they could be placed in lobbies, exits, outside and "possibly even our hallways."

Anna Faktorovich debated against the motion, saying that the issue wasn't so clear-cut.

"Scott does have some points. Students have been raped, things have been happening that shouldn't have been, but we can't just say no way Jose to this. We can't be sure that residence halls are private spaces," Faktorovich said. She later agreed, after questioning that, beyond cameras, a community watch could also be an effective security measure.

Debating against Faktorovich, Senator Patrick Callahan said that while he agreed with her sentiments, he felt that the motion only asked that the administration listen to student concerns.

"This is a student friendly motion," Callahan, who had earlier announced that he would seek the Associate Speaker of the Senate, said. Callahan took a question from Zachary Spilman that asked why people were afraid of cameras, but couldn't answer as time ran out.

The motion passed, but not unanimously.

During the presentation of the second Howe written motion, the SGA president answered Spilman's question, saying that students should be presumed innocent until proven guilty, and that was a right that everyone could expect to the clapping of some in the Senate.

The second motion called for the creation of a community watch. Explaining the legislation, Howe told a story.

"Last night, at the safety walk, I told Chancellor Scott about our referendum [A student referendum voted on during the last election came out heavily against cameras] and he looked at me and said that an insignificant number of students voted for the referendum," Howe said. "This is pro-active legislation."

Howe was asked a number of questions, including whether or not the same students who could burn a security desk could break cameras.

"Absolutely. They can be broken quite easily, and despite elaborate protections, a can of spray paint can undo most of the work," Howe said. He also explained that Southwest was chosen as the site for the cameras because of the weekend fires.

"Nobody is saying that what happened there Saturday night was right, and in fact it makes us look like a bunch of fools, but that doesn't mean cameras should be put in," Howe said.

The motion was passed unanimously. Howe was excited to have the legislation passed, saying that it was what the SGA had to do.

"We needed to make a statement of support for the student body," Howe said. "These cameras violate every governance of student government."

Only one other motion was passed before there was a motion to adjourn.

Designed to conserve resources while still informing students of what their senators had been working on, a motion written by Southwest At-Large Senator Kim

VITA frees locals from tax burden

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student organization that offers free tax assistance is holding its last session tomorrow evening as April 18, the tax deadline, is less than a week away.

The program, Volunteer Income Tax Assistance (VITA), helps both international and domestic filers on the campus and in the community. VITA International holds sessions in the UMass Isenberg School of Management and VITA Domestic assists locals at Hampshire Mall, three days a week from mid-February to the last day of filing.

Although it has been 12 years since VITA's inception, coordinator Michael Whiteman said, "It's never taken on the significance it now enjoys."

In fact, the crowd was so large at one recent VITA International session, it could not be accomodated even after an hour extension. Whiteman usually commutes between locations, but recently has not been able to go to Hampshire Mall due to the heavy crowds at the international session.

Whiteman said the clientele consists of international students and faculty, U.S. citizens who have low income, those for whom English is a second language, others who are mentally and physically handicapped, and others "who simply can't afford to have a professional prepare their tax forms."

Some 40 students participate, each session staffed by seven or eight. Many students receive one academic credit, whereas student administrators get two to three credits, depending on their level of responsibility.

Whiteman considers VITA a "unique opportunity for the students to gain a significant amount of hands-on experience." He said VITA offers managerial, practical and people experience. Filing taxes, he added, will be a part of many of these students' future careers.

VITA prefers to have volunteers who have completed Accounting 371, Individual Income Taxation, but a few volunteers have taken no tax courses. For these students, the training provided by the Internal Revenue Service and the state is essential and a refresher for the majority.

"The IRS is very supportive of this," Whiteman said, noting that the IRS loaned the students four state-of-the-art laptop computers as well as IRS software to complete the tax returns. Since last year, VITA has been using the laptops to prepare all federal tax returns.

On the other hand, Whiteman is very supportive of the IRS. He is, essentially, an IRS agent turned UMass professor. From IRS agent, he became a trial attorney in the IRS' Office of Chief Counsel and later worked as a tax attorney with a regional firm. "I think the IRS performs a very valuable function," said Whitman, though, "nobody likes taxes."

Whiteman's other activities include speaking for the UMass Tax School and administering the UMass Tax Team.

Whiteman teaches three taxation courses by day and administers VITA three nights a week. "I could be making a lot more money doing something else," he admitted, "but I really love this. I enjoy the students, the classes."

In fact, it is the students he credits when referring to VITA Whiteman said, "We have some very talented students and without them the program would fail."

VITA International sessions will be held tonight and tomorrow night from 5 to 8 p.m. in the Isenberg School of Management. Tonight the session will be in Room 7 and in Room 10 on Thursday. VITA Domestic sessions are offered at the Hampshire Mall in the community room near the information desk at the same days and times.

For those who miss these dates, student volunteers will be at the Amherst Post Office on University Drive on April 18, the final day to file, to offer last-minute help on state and federal tax returns from 5 to 6:30 p.m.

Powers speaks on adolescents

By Erica Mattison
Collegian Staff

Yesterday afternoon University of Massachusetts Professor Sally Powers spoke about depression among adolescents. She provided general facts and theories about depression, and also reported the findings of her three-year study of parents and their adolescent children.

This lecture was the second this semester sponsored by the Center for the Family, which is a part of the Department of Consumer Studies.

Powers started off by explaining that one's concept of "normal" adolescent behavior is vital because it can either make parents hyper sensitive or oblivious to symptoms in their children. "You can't understand if an individual is depressed unless you know what normal behavior is," stated Powers.

Powers gave examples of two types of parents. Some parents believe that adolescent behavior is the same as pre-adolescent behavior, which leads them to see their children's behavior as abnormal. They will usually be over-concerned about what is really typical teenage behavior. Parents at the other extreme expect their adolescents to demonstrate extreme moodiness on a regular basis. These parents may tend to overlook symptoms of depression because they see it as "normal" behavior. In these cases it might take something like running away or attempting suicide for the parents to realize that something is not right.

Powers enumerated some of the major changes that impact adolescents. These include the biological changes of puberty, the transition from elementary school to middle school or middle school to high school and increasing worries about the future.

In describing the turmoil of adolescence, Powers quoted psychoanalyst Anna Freud: "'To be normal in adolescence is abnormal.'" Powers was quick to point out that Anna Freud's research was based on troubled teens who sought help.

In comparison, Powers mentioned other research that enlisted thousands of adolescents. Because this was a more diverse group of people, the researchers found that the adolescents did feel changes, but they also felt a "strong sense of continuity and [a desire to] keep strong emotional contacts" they had before.

It is necessary to recognize when adolescents are acting normal and when there is reason to worry, said Powers. "Adolescents should be bouncing back quickly."

Of American adolescents, 20 percent report depressive symptoms. Powers said this statistic shows that depression is not normal and it should not be ignored. "When we see depression, we shouldn't let it pass. It's important to pay

Gay marriages discussed

By Virginia Avedisian

Last night at 7:30 p.m. in Thompson Hall Mary Bonauto, one of the lawyers who recently tried the landmark same-sex couple benefit case before the Vermont Supreme Court gave a talk entitled "Marriage? Civil Union? Where is Vermont Leading the Country?" Bonauto is also the civil rights director for the Boston-based Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD).

Bonauto spoke on the recent strides in the Gay and Lesbian community in the area of same sex marriages. These strides were furthered by the Second Parent Adoption, which enables same-couples to have a legal relationship with their children even though the parents themselves may not have one to each other and the Factor of Parenthood which states that if a same-sex couple should separate, one parent cannot prevent the other from visitation with their child. Bonauto stated, "This case does not merely deal with same-sex couple marriages, but also civil rights and discrimination issues as well."

The now-famous case that Bonauto tried was known as Baker vs. Vermont. It has made national headlines and has drawn the attention of both supporters of same-sex benefits and opponents who argue same-sex couples should not have the same legal standing as heterosexual married couples.

Congress recently passed the Defense of Marriage Act, which attempts to relieve individual states of the Constitutional obligation to honor same-sex marriages approved by other states. Several states themselves are also debating the issue of whether or not to recognize same-sex marriages allowed in other states.

Bonauto explained that in December 1999, the Vermont Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples are entitled to the same benefits and protections given to heterosexual married couples. This was based on the Common Benefits Clause that acknowledged "the plaintiffs as Vermonters who seek nothing more nor less than legal protection and security for their commitment to an intimate and lasting human relationship is simply, when all is said and done, a recognition of our common humanity."

After the ruling by the Supreme Court had gone through, it then left the issue up to the legislature to craft a remedy. The legislature decided to go with a parallel system and propose a Civil Union Bill. The Civil Union Bill serves as a protection to families that exist with same-sex couples. A Civil

Females dominate annual math event

By Adam Martignetti and Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The results for the 15th annual University of Massachusetts Mathematics Competition were recently announced and two female sophomores will split the first-place prize money.

Meghan Anderson, currently undeclared, and Hui-Chung Ling, a Biochemistry major, tied for first place in this year's competition and both will take home $1300 for their efforts.

Ling also participated in and won last year's competition. When asked if there had ever been repeat winners before, Ling said that this was the first time a prior winner has been allowed to participate in the following year's competition. "I thought the test was harder this year," Ling added.

As a veteran of the annual event, she believes "the competition should be made more public. I think a lot of people don't know about the competition. More people should have the opportunity to take the exam."

Ling, who wants to attend medical school after college is also currently pursuing a mathematics minor. She said of the subject, "I don't find it hard. It comes... not naturally. I'm the sort of person who takes mathematics. I'll take four years."

Retired UMass professor Henry Iacobs, who is associated with the annual competition, was doubly surprised by the biochemist's good performance, commenting, "In previous years most of our winners came from engineering, math and physics and computer science. I don't think we've ever had a biochemist place among the top three winners." He added, "She has done rather exceedingly well."

Speaking on her victory, Meghan Anderson said, "I

Salaycik would allow each senator to post what they have been working on in the lobbies of their buildings, rather than posting on floors.

The motion was passed unanimously.

Howe, besides the fact that his motions were passed, was also pleased that his cabinet appointments went through so easily. Usually an issue of some contention, all six appointments were unanimously approved to enter the cabinet.

Sheila Tunney was appointed as Secretary of Administrative Affairs. Jeff Bazydlo was appointed as the Secretary of Finance. Jennifer Casavant was appointed as the Secretary of University Policy. Sarah Hamill was appointed as the Secretary of Public Policy and Relations. Colleen Gilchrist was appointed as the Secretary of the Registry and Jon Laubinger was appointed as the Attorney General.

"[That everyone was voted in] is a symptom of people who are doing great work," Howe said. "They have great initiatives to work on that will benefit the student body."

Senate Speaker Mikale Billard said that the appointments going through without opposition was unheard of.

"It's the first year not one cabinet member was opposed by anybody," Billard said. "I don't think anybody had any real problems with appointments."

The only other major issue facing the Senate last night was last week's meeting. After producing a memo that was alleged to prove that Billard had been moved up to the position of SGA president, Commuter Area Senator Zachary Spilman was thrown out after nine minutes. He later had to be escorted from the meeting by the Campus Center Night Manager after he re-entered the meeting.

He received the memo from Associate Speaker of the Senate Jen Teixeira, who had, depending on reports, found the document in the trash or on Billard's desk. Rumors had swirled about the possibility that Spilman would be impeached and Teixeira would be asked to step down. Nothing came of those rumors, and Howe said he was willing to let the matter drop if Teixeira would answer questions he had about Spilman's behavior at the meeting.

"Was what happened last week right," Howe asked. Spilman said, from the back of the room, "what a crock," before being warned by Billard, who pleaded with the Senate not to shout out.

"We need to move forward and forget this. I just want to know if what happened was right," Howe said.

Spilman partially agreed, saying he wasn't interested in bogging down the Senate with internal matters. Although he too, like Howe, wanted to address "lingering issues. But I don't know how to address those issues."

Union Certificate is basically the same thing as a marriage certificate for heterosexual couples, yet the Civil Union Certificate is reserved solely for same-sex couples. It also specified that children that come from same-sex couples "belong" to both parents, not just the birth parent. The Bill passed in the legislature with a vote of 76 to 69. The Bill now goes on to the Senate and there is still a question of whether or not it will pass and become an actual law.

Bonauto concluded her speech by quoting her co-counsel in saying, "same-sex families and couples are going to have a legal status that they never had before, and that means for the first time ever, that we are on the bus.

She went on to say, "if we all get on the bus, we'll all be talking to each other, we'll be changing seats and eventually it won't be such a big deal who's at the front and who's at the back."

The sub-headline of yesterday's Collegian article entitled "Vanin suspends five UMass students" was incorrect. The sub-headline misidentified five students as having been involved in the Feb. 15 alleged rape, when only three of the suspended students were actually involved. Neither John M. Moran nor Jared T. Bruun had any involvement implicated in the alleged rape. The Collegian regrets and apologizes for the error.

What to do with Elian Gonzalez

By Hector Tobar
Los Angeles Times

MIAMI, FL– Not far from the tiny stucco house where a 6-year-old Cuban castaway has spent months living under the persistent eye of the media, there resides a 61-year-old Cuban bus driver and grandfather named Marcos Correa.

All is well and calm in the Correa household until the subject of the castaway boy comes up. Then the home erupts into a high-decibel shouting match filled with finger pointing and the occasional Spanish swear word.

Marcos Correa is part of the small minority of Cubans in south Florida who think Elian Gonzalez – or "Eliancito," as he's affectionately known - should be reunited with his father. He says this even while acknowledging that the boy's return to Cuba will benefit Fidel Castro, who, just about everyone here agrees, is a vile dictator.

Maria Elena Correa hears her husband say this and can barely contain her anger. "There is no gray here," she says. "It's black and white. You're with Fidel, or you're not!"

For five months the story of Elian Gonzalez has played out like a municipal telenovela in Miami's Cuban community, a story that obliges its audience to take sides. The drama is all the more compelling because a real boy's life hangs in the balance, and because most Cuban families see one parallel or another between his young life and their own.

Although about 1 million Cubans and Cuban-Americans live in south Florida, Little Havana is a much smaller place, where a certain provincialism reigns. Every Cuban family here, it seems, can claim some connection or another to one of the protagonists in the story.

With the case accelerating toward a conclusion that most Cubans in Miami consider tragic, the mood is especially raw. Among the Correas – profiled 16 years ago by the Miami Herald as a "typical" working-class Cuban-American family – there have been more heated discussions between parents and children, and between husbands and wives.

"The other night my husband and I had an argument about this," says Marilyn Correa Gonzalez, 39, the Correas' oldest daughter. "My husband is a selfish male. His opinion is that a father has as much right in Cuba as anywhere else. But I don't believe this man (Juan Miguel Gonzalez) has any interest in his son."

The youngest of the Correas' five children, Orlando, is the one most "obsessed" with Elian's fate, his parents say. He believes passionately that the boy should stay in Miami. A recent poll shows 88 percent of Miami Cubans agree with him. But the Correas also have a daughter who thinks the rowdy protesters keeping a constant vigil in front of Elian's house are an embarrassment to the Cuban-American community.

"The old folks who have no life, who are all on Social Security, are the ones out there," Blanca Correa, 31, says. "The people who are young and who are up-and-coming are not out there."

The protesters have become the public face of Cuban-Americans to the outside world. On Sunday they took turns beating up a bra-wearing effigy of Castro. Some have vowed to create a "human chain" around the house if federal agents come for Elian. But interviews with members of the Correa family indicate that sentiment is not universal.

"From the beginning, I felt he should be with his father, if that's what his father wants," says Blanca Correa's husband, Jose Cespedes, the Cuban-born son of a former political prisoner. "As a father, if he was my kid, I would want him with me. You wouldn't want anyone else to raise him. He's my son, my blood."

Maria Elena Correa is a teacher at Citrus Grove Elementary, a few blocks from the home where Elian is staying. One of her co-workers has family in Cardenas, the small Cuban town where Elian lived with his father, and says she knows the Gonzalez family.

"This man mistreated his wife, and that's why she got a divorce," Maria Elena Correa says, repeating allegations that some family members have begun circulating. "My friend goes there three times a year, so she knows. She's from that barrio. And that's what they say there."

Orlando Correa went to the same high school as Marisleysis Gonzalez, Elian's cousin who is sometimes described by the press here as the boy's "surrogate mother."

A producer at a local television station, Orlando Correa has taken time off from his job to immerse himself in Elian's cause, joining activists working to keep Elian in Miami.

Through his friendship with Marisleysis Gonzalez, Orlando Correa has been able to meet Elian. He describes these encounters with reverence.

"Whenever I'm with Elian, I see him like one of my nephews and nieces. He wants to enjoy the paradise of this country," he says. "The attachments that he has deposited with his cousin and his family in Miami have filled that emptiness in his heart" caused by his mother's death.

Orlando Correa says he no longer talks about Elian with his own father, who thinks the boy should go back to Cuba.

"I try to avoid the tension," Orlando says. "I don't take anything away from what my father went through." Marcos and Maria Elena Correa fled Cuba in 1962 to escape Castro's regime.

National Collegiate Faculty salaries have increased this year

By Maria Tor
Cavalier Daily (U. Virginia)

(U-WIRE) CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA – American collegiate faculty members' salaries increased by 3.7 percent this year, according to the American Association of University Professors' annual salary report released this week.

The AAUP reported that the average salary of a full-time faculty member rose from $56,282 last year to $58,352 this year.

The report found full-time professors earn an average of $76,197 nationwide. The average full-time University professor's salary is $101,179, a 4.78 percent increase from $96,501 last year.

Twenty-eight other schools have an average professor salary of over $100,000. Last year, only 19 schools had an average professor salary over $100,000.

The report found the average salary of all ranks of professors and instructors at the University of Virginia is $78,012, up by about $3,000 from last year.

The survey omits medical school professors because their pay is usually much higher than other faculty members' salaries.

University Astronomy professor Robert O'Connell said although $101,179 seems high, the AAUP's practice of lumping all professors - graduate and undergraduate – into the same category inflates the overall numbers.

For example, O'Connell said professors in the College have salaries that are still significantly lower than salaries at other public institutions.

Faculty Senate Chairman David T. Gies agreed the figures can be misleading. "I think the real issue is not gross dollar figures, but the need to stay competitive with other schools," Gies said.

He said he applauds the University and Commonwealth's efforts to improve faculty salaries, which have been low compared to the University's peer institutions since 1990.

Gies said University President John T. Casteen III announced at a recent Faculty Senate meeting that he hopes to secure enough funds from the state to raise University faculty salaries to the 60th percentile among its peer institutions.

Offering competitive salaries is the best way the University can "recruit and retain the best faculty possible for UVA's undergraduate students," Gies said.

enjoy that kind of thinking and those kind of problems." She continued, "Anybody could have taken the test. I can only think of a couple questions that a specific math class helped me to solve, but other than that it was like an exercise in thinking."

This was Anderson's first time taking the exam and she was humbled to have been tied with a previous winner. Anderson added, "It makes me wish that I had taken it last year. I really thought that as freshman I wouldn't be at a level where I would be competing, but obviously she [Ling] was and that's really cool."

Jacobs said of Anderson, "I've never seen an undeclared major winning top honors in the competition. It's unusual from my point of view. She's definitely a talented mathematician."

This year's competition further helps to breech the idea that mathematics is an area reserved only for men, Jacobs explained.

"This is the first year that we've had two women in the top spots," he said. "I think the situation is rapidly changing. I'm seeing each year more women in the competition." Anderson was excited about the dual female winners, commenting, "I really think it's great that the tie was between two girls because I think there is still a stereotype that women can't do well in math."

Jacobs reasoned, "They see role models of women who have chosen to go into the field of sciences and done particularly well and it serves as an incentive," adding that job companies are looking to increase the number of women in these fields.

Speaking on the improvements to this year's competition, Jacobs stated, "We have a web-site this year and for the first time we posted practice problems from our preceding years so that students could get some idea of what they're likely to encounter, although the problems are always different from year to year."

attention to it," Powers explained. She added that early identification of depression can predict later problems, such as substance use, adult depression, marriage problems and unemployment.

Diagnostic criteria for major depression states that a "full episode of depression must last at least two weeks" and the episode must be characterized by either a "persistently depressed/irritable mood" or a "significant loss in interest or pleasure in usual activities." In order to diagnose major depression, four of the following symptoms must also be present almost every day: significant weight or appetite loss or gain; sleeps too much or can't sleep; slowed or hyperactive activity; fatigue or loss of energy; feelings of worthlessness or excessive guilt; loss of ability to think/concentrate/make decisions; recurrent thoughts of death or suicide/suicide plan or attempt. Powers noted that two people with depression can possess dramatically different symptoms.

Depression is present in females two to three times as often as males, according to Powers. Childhood is the only stage in life during which males are more likely than females to suffer from depression.

Lastly, Powers shared the results of her study in which residents of nine rural Western Massachusetts towns participated. She was "looking at the way kids resolve conflict," paying particular attention to the difference between boys and girls. The data was compiled by having students fill out a survey, having mothers and daughers analyze videotapes of their own conversations and, in the third year of the study, performing another survey.

She found that the girls with more depressive symptoms saw themselves as very "conflictual and submissive" in the videotaped arguments with their mothers; meanwhile their mothers interpreted their behavior as humorous. Powers explains this by saying that girls tend to be aggressive, but then use humor to back away. This behavior can make it difficult for mothers to recognize depression in their daughters.

In boys, the study revealed different behavior. Boys who were more depressed than their counterparts tended to withdraw and give in during conversations with their mothers. They also demonstrated a high level of sarcasm, which their mothers interpreted as unsupportive. This behavior among depressed boys is more noticeable than the behavior of depressed girls, said Powers.

"In adolescence you have to learn how to fight with people you love and be successful [while at the same time] staying connected to those people," Powers commented.

The next lecture in the series is scheduled for May 9 at 5:30 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The speaker will be Patricia Hersch, author of A Tribe Apart, a book which deals with adolescent experiences today.

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

Our Opinion

Lopsided Spring Concert

We do not hate rap.

We have nothing against the Method Man, Redman, Biz Markie, or Beenie Man. Method Man and Redman are some of the biggest draws currently on tour in this country, and we're sure that the other acts are more than worthy of being booked for the UMass Spring Concert, one of the largest shows each year in this area.

There's just one problem. They're all the same genre.

Call it rap, hip hop, or what you will, the fact remains that five out of the seven acts scheduled for the Spring Concert are of the same type of music. Actually, that number could climb to five of seven if the winner of the Southwest Battle of the Bands (who automatically gains a slot at the show) happens to be a hip hop act, which could very well happen. The one other act at the Spring Show, the Long Beach Dub All-Stars, is a ska-rock band.

For an amazingly diverse campus with huge amounts of different people, this is a remarkably and unfortunately homogeneous lineup. Judging by the bands playing at the Spring Concert, you'd think that eighty-five percent of the student body is entirely composed of hard-core hip hop fans, and the other fifteen percent were into ska. And that's it.

No one on this campus, evidently, listens to country. No one is into hard rock or metal. No one likes jam bands, techno, pop group. No one listens to female singers. There is not a single human being on this campus who isn't a huge rap fan and a minor ska fan.

That just isn't true.

There are as many types of music as there are people who go to school here, and only two of them are represented. This is truly unacceptable.

We here at the Collegian realize that it is impossible to please everyone. We know that money is limited, that there are time constraints and other handicaps that concert organizers must deal with. We believe that much hard work went into the presenting of this year's Spring Concert, but to have a bill that is so blatantly slanted towards one type of music is still completely ridiculous.

Money is an issue when you are dealing with huge name bands, such as you would like to headline. There are, however, in this world bands which are not huge names which could play on an undercard which do not demand enormous salaries and could not necessarily play hip-hop. One fairly unknown rock band, country band, or techno band could have helped make this show appeal to a broader section of the UMass campus instantly, but that did not happen.

What will happen to the Spring Concert when all the music fans who have no reason to come stay at home and listen to their CDs instead? A half-empty Mullins Center will really appeal to big-name bands for next year, eh? There is absolutely no reason for a vast percentage of the UMass student body to attend this show. The hip hop fans will come and stay; the ska fans will come and go; some others may come just to hang out, but many will stay away – they obviously aren't wanted. Their music, evidently, is not worth representing.

The Collegian believes that the UMass Spring Concert is not diverse enough for an event which should represent the entire campus. We simply hope that next year the organizers learn from their wretched mistake and put on a better show.

A debt all students owe

I'm graduating, and I'm in debt. I hope you all can relate. It's not money I owe, though. Well, not just money. I owe my duty to my society. I owe a duty to leave this place and make the world better.

I said just about the same thing seven years ago when I left this university and joined the army. I was desperate for a sense of doing something important, something useful. So I left my mother weeping at the door, worried that I was flying off to meet unspeakable, nightmarish horrors in far off lands, never to know comfort or peace again. I ended up in Hawaii. Aloha.

I served as a journalist with the 25th Infantry Division at Schofield Barracks. Over the course of those years it became clear how important – and how under-appreciated – the work is of soldiers in general and infantrymen in particular. Even in Hawaii, it's a hard life to lead. Long marches, long deployments away from their families, and a paycheck not commensurate with the kind of sacrifices our nation asks them to make. They trained hard, though they knew that they likely wouldn't have to fight. One told me, "People don't understand what we're doing. I wish people cared more." So I spent those years telling their story, like I have for these few moments, as one of them, because I owe them that duty.

Only at the end of my tour, after five years of counting down days until I could come back to school here, did I really understand that the work I did was important. When I left I think some part of the army – some small part of the world – felt my absence. And I feel theirs.

But I knew then and I know now that I would be a better journalist with more education. Here I am, back at UMass, older. Old. I'm 27. It's whining, I know. It's a different experience at school when you're ten years older than some freshmen. I was a 17-year-old freshman here in 1990. Amherst protested vehemently against the Gulf War. There was a young man who, protesting, burned himself to death on the Amherst Common. Amherst and UMass have a protest tradition. I was...skeptical...at first, about my reception.

I'm happy to say that I've had a very positive experience here. I've learned much from this distinguished faculty. But some of the most surprising, most exciting, and most uplifting things to learn here have been outside of the classroom. I got a job directing the news at WMUA radio, 91.1 FM, Amherst. Radio was new to me. It was a chance to learn a new set of reporting skills. It was also an excuse to poke my nose into anything I wanted to on campus.

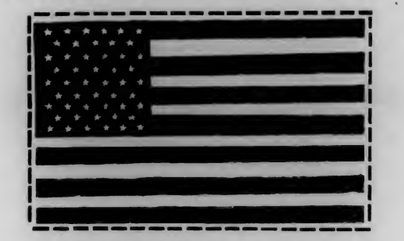
George Chidi

About a year and a half ago, students were protesting changes in the role of race in admissions. They protested not on their own behalf – after all, students here already got in to school – but for those students who would follow. When they spoke, I heard familiar words. People don't understand what we're doing. I wish people cared more, I heard.

Students stood outside the Student Union last semester, holding hands around the campus pond or crowded around a speaker's platform, after women reported being attacked there. Students formed their own security agency, the Pondwatch. They took time from their classes, and in fact, they didn't know for sure if it would even work. When I talked to some Pondwatch volunteers, I heard it again. "People should care more," they told me.

Fraternities and sororities volunteer thousands of hours in the community, without pay or much recognition. Rather than Cancun or Jamaica, another group of students went to Birmingham, Alabama on a social service project – an alternative spring break. How many students here have sacrificed time and energy improving this community? There are at least 20 cultural organizations, six honor societies, ten media outfits, eight performing arts groups, 12 political groups not including student government, and many, many social organizations, student businesses and other groups contributing to the common good. And I write here to tell the story of the value of these sacrifices as one of you, because I owe you that duty.

So, though at first I was skeptical about Amherst's culture of demonstration, I realize that folks here share a similar motivation of soldiers – a sense of duty to something greater than themselves. And we should. In fact, we must, because it's why we're here at this university. The University of Massachusetts grew from an agricultural college to the center of learning it is now after World War II. Returning soldiers needed a place to use their G.I. Bill, and this commonwealth saw a duty to help educate them. Only after World War II did Americans start going to college in great numbers. And only after a college education became achievable for the working-class American did our nation begin its greatest economic, social and intellectual growth.



G.I. Bill or not, it costs a lot of money to come to school here. But there is a reason that this state university is less expensive than most private schools. Our parents, and their parents, the citizens of this state, support this school with their taxes. The rich, the famous and the powerful did not create this university. Carpenters and bricklayers, police officers and truck drivers, secretaries and nurses created this university. People like my grandfather, Leonard Gosselin, who fought in World War II and then came home to work as a machinist for 40 years in a factory in a little mill town created this university. Ordinary people spent money from their taxes they could have used to help feed their families and pay their mortgages to create this university, and they created this university to make a statement. And it's an extraordinary statement: We are not ordinary people. We are extraordinary, because we care. And I write here to tell the story of the value of these contributions as one more extraordinarily ordinary citizen, because I owe them that duty.

So we're at the end of our academic career, fellow students, looking for a message, I think. I think we want to know why we've spent four years of our lives counting pennies, eating Ramen noodles at one in the morning with an eighty-dollar book open on our desks, trundling off to school in the cold to sit elbow-to-elbow with our classmates, watching our debts rise. I think we want to know if it was worth it. I'm a college man now, so I'm authorized to make these leaps of intuitive reasoning.

Was it worth it? As a fellow student and citizen, I say we must make it worth it. People are counting on us to go out into the world and do extraordinary things. More than just our parents, but our society counts on us – on us! – to make it worth it. When people ask, "why doesn't anyone care?" they're asking us, because our time here was supposed to give us the intellectual tools, the reasoning, and especially the heart to do something about our society's problems. We must prosper, we must build our society, and we must succeed. Our society educated us, and so we have a duty to leave this place and make the world better.

What it's like to be the younger sister

I would have to say that I missed out on some important parts of my childhood. It's beyond the fact that I never got to go to Disney World. I went to school, played in my backyard and had to share a cotton candy-pink bedroom with my sister. I had a bedtime that I hated to abide by and ate Popsicles by my pool in the summer. The worst things I did was try and hide behind the couch to watch "Dallas" and read by the streetlight at night in my bedroom.

Maybe it's just that I was a boring kid, or that I am three years younger, but I swear that my brother had a better childhood than me. Why do I think that? Because he's a boy. Here's the deal.

Kathleen Ralls

I don't think that my parents were particularly sexist in raising us. My mother did stay home with us for a while and my dad worked, but she continued her teaching career when the last of us reached first grade. My dad didn't discourage my sister and me from playing sports and always took us to the Red Sox each year. In fact, my parents were so cool that I never had to play with dolls, especially Barbie dolls. My mother hated them so much that I think I am the only girl in North America between the ages of 10 and 50 who never had one.

I think it has more to do with better toys and better clothes, and the fact that boys have a better way of getting along. I already discussed Barbies, but think about it: it's a hot summer day and you would rather play in a sand box with some ugly, stringy-haired doll than learn how to throw a changeup? Luckily for me, our sandpit was also our basketball court (we enjoyed the challenging of dribbling on a soft and malleable surface to predictable pavement) and I could never bury any dolls.

Think about Matchbox cars. I never got one car. My brother would receive a big, blue vinal box of them whenever an aunt or uncle would come over. Of course, he would spend the rest of the afternoon rearranging them by color or style while making sure that I never got my mitts on them. Unless he threw a pink one my way that he didn't want.

Which brings me to an all-important point. What is it with pink and girls? I've mentioned before that I hate pink, and that it totally clashes with red hair. My room was pink and my best friend Katie's room was pink. My cousin made me pink and yellow barrettes with ribbons that flowed in my hair. My spring jacket was pink and half of my dresses were that same color. I had pink Strawberry Shortcake sneakers and sleeping bag for crying out loud.

My favorite clothes were, unfortunately, hand-me-downs from my brother. When I was four, he gave me a blue jacket with Major League Baseball team patches all over it. I thought it was the coolest thing I had ever seen. I wore it with my hand-me-down navy dungarees from my Tommy. In third grade, when Tommy received his first pair of Air Jordans, I got his old dingy white hi-tops. The traditional Irish-Catholic family that we are, he never had to wear dresses but I wore one every day with terrible magenta Mary Janes.

However, the biggest issue stands before us. I have always admired how males just get games of catch or 21 going with a couple phone calls or just a little initiation. Not once did I ever have a friend come over to practice fielding ground balls or to play H-O-R-S-E. As far as I know, girls really don't do that. When friends came over, we sat in the house and watched a movie or just swam. In the pool, it was never competitive; we never raced laps back and forth across our round aboveground pool.

In high school, I had one friend whose dad rented out gym space in the winter so that we could practice softball for the upcoming season. Otherwise, I was left to play by myself, my dad (who is a good sport about my lack of aim), or getting my ass kicked by my brother and my friends.

I think that's our problem. We can't really handle competition as well. It's almost never just left on the court – it's always personal. When I'm hanging out with my girl friends, I don't think playing catch is ever in our top 10 list of ideas or things to do. If we do, it's a big planned ordeal that generally turns out to be the highlight of our day. It's sad, because I don't think it's really a matter of not being motivated or not being athletic. It's just that it's not in our culture.

I think some of this has changed since I was raised in the 1980s. At least I hope so. It's become chic to wear athletic shorts and t-shirts for females, and even if the games are sometimes staged to gain attention, at least they're doing something right.

Grammar is murder

We live in a society where rarely can it be said that we don't exploit our natural resources enough. I mean, we're tearing apart the rain forests, our beaches are eroding and a couple of weeks ago there was a vast shortage of Twinkies. Who knows, soon we may have to live without oil, natural gas, Carson Daly or Post-It-Notes. We live in a society where it often happens that we don't realize we have something until it's gone. There is, however, one thing that we as natives of the English language do not use enough. It is something that was given to us by our ancestors. It is an item that was left for us to make our lives simpler and more manageable. It is a gift from God that shows his true vision and all knowingness. This grand resource which we as American citizens have not nearly made enough use of is the semi-colon.

Dan Viens

The semi-colon is a vastly important part of English grammar. The problem is that many people have no idea how to use it. Professors across this university and throughout the world often cringe when they see how the majority of students make sparse and pathetic use of our beloved semi-colon. Many people mistakenly use the semi-colon in place of a comma or full-blown colon. Oftentimes people make the ghastly mistake of using the semi-colon when instead an entirely new sentence should be started. Well, I am here to tell you that the semi-colon is not a comma, the semi-colon is not a colon and for chrissakes it is not a tool to be used throughout your grammatically inferior papers and book reports.

The semi-colon is a work of art. Much like DaVinci's Mona Lisa and Michelangelo's David, the semi-colon has been placed on this earth for us to marvel at its beauty. However, unlike the other art I have spoken of, part of the semi-colon's beauty is that as literate human beings we are allowed to use it till our heart's content. Just like the illiterate people down South have guns, we have the semi-colon. Ahh, it is such an exciting time to be alive knowing that we can use the semi-colon as we see fit.

However, don't take this use of the semi-colon for granted. There was a time, not to long ago, when the use of this miracle of grammar was outlawed in many English-speaking lands. You see, originally the semi-colon was a three dimensional metal weapon used in medieval battles. Every now and then when a barbarian would bring a man within an inch of his death instead of killing him outright he would commit one of the most painful acts ever thought of on his opponent. He would grab his semi-colon by the part that looks like a period and then stick the part that looks like a comma right up the guy's wazoo. Once the semi-colon was way up the guy the barbarian would rip out part of the colon and show it to his victim Mortal Kombat style. This is how the semi-colon got its name and its eventual use in today's grammar.

For a hundreds of years the royalty in England outlawed the use of any semi-colons. This is one reason why no one knows who Shakespeare really is. He felt it was necessary to use semi-colons in his plays and sonnets. However, he knew that if he were found out he would be executed. Finally Queen Elizabeth II came along and realized that we needed something in order to tag on final thoughts to a sentence. Thus the semi-colon was legally instituted into modern grammar. The semi-colon has retained the same shape as its brutal medieval ancestor and still does its job as helping to finish something off that is almost done.

If one looks at the semi-colon it is apparent that this piece of punctuation is capable of uniting the earth into a peaceful and loving world. On the outside chance that some of you don't understand this correlation, I'll help you out. As I said before, the top of the semi-colon looks like a period and the bottom like a comma. The period and comma are polar opposites. The former represents a halt in action, the definitive end to an event or idea. On the other hand, the latter represents flowing action. The comma represents the linking of many separate ideas. If the semi-colon is capable of uniting these two archrivals, then who knows what else it is capable of doing. I would say that our little grammatical buddy has the potential to link the U.S. and Cuba, Heaven and Hell, Bruce Willis and Demi Moore, or maybe even Microsoft and NBC. Well maybe not the last one, but definitely the other three.

Along with a vast group of powerful Americans, I am proposing a bill to Congress that would provide for a national holiday celebrating the semi-colon. The bill would also require each and every literate person to use the semi-colon at least twice in every paragraph. Each time someone is found not to have complied with the rules of semi-colonism they would have a small semi-colon tattooed on their body. The more times a person went without using a semi-colon the closer they would be to becoming a human semi-colon. I have received backing from many powerful members of the English-speaking community. These members include Muhammad Ali, the entire family of Elian Gonzalez, Stuttering John, Stevie Wonder and the dog from Beethoven. With these important English speakers and writers behind me I don't see how my bill won't pass.

Finally, I would like to appeal to you, my peers. A lot of you have countless papers and letters to your RDs left to write before your college career is through. Please, throughout all of these papers sprinkle semi-colons as if they are specs of fairy dust that will bring you magical results. Although our little magical grammatical wonder may be a little tough to grasp at first I promise that if you make constant generous use of it you will reap the benefits. I know it has done wonders for me.

David Mead Stands in Traffic and Trinket Booms in Trax

TRINKET
Boom
BMG

Trinket doesn't pull any punches with "Boom," the first radio single from their upcoming release Set to Explode, which is set to drop on June 4. The four-piece is determined to catch your attention with a silly pop chorus, and for such an elusive goal, Trinket manages to succeed. It doesn't get much more basic than "she goes boom," but it wins the listener over with some snazzy guitar solos and the singer's tongue-in-cheek delivery. The song has a swagger and charm reminiscent of Beck, and while the band's music is too strong to allow for a Beck-style one-man show, something more original and creative will be necessary for Trinket to attain Beck-style popularity. C+ (Michael Delano)

DAVID MEAD
The Luxury of Time
RCA Records

The Luxury of Time tries to be a lot of things. Calling it a pop rock album might seem appropriate at times, but it does no justice to the gospel and folk elements visible in many places. At times, the album turns its attention to classic rock in the vein of the Beach Boys, while at other times a song will escalate little beyond a soft-ly picked acoustic guitar and Mead's evocative tenor (comparisons to the late, great Jeff Buckley come to mind). The myriad approaches used in constructing the album's 13 tracks provide a wealth of appealing musical textures, aided by a cast of veteran musicians, including Kenny Aronoff (John Mellencamp) on drums and Jim Horn (Elvis Presley, The Beach Boys, Steely Dan) on saxophone.

The songwriting itself is solid, if not stunningly original. Mead, it seems, is better at synthesizing previous styles than concocting his own unique sounds. The album's first single, "World of a King," is a rousing gospel song, emphatic and inviting, and yet to some degree inevitably uninteresting because of its extremely derivative nature. "Telephone" sounds like any number of alternative radio singles currently fighting it out on the charts – it's a fine song, but there's little reason to recommend it above its contemporaries.

Ultimately, The Luxury of Time offers a handful of gems in a bag of maturely applied but all the same tired musical formulas. For Mead, it's a promising debut release, and hopefully a good first lesson in the necessity of innovation. B- (David Troupes)

MAGNIFIED
Stand in Traffic
TVT

West Coast four-piece Magnified doesn't sound sufficiently different, at first listen, to the hordes of light-alternative garbage that has been clogging popular music lately, like Five 6 or Marvelous 3. Upon closer inspection, however, their debut album Stand in Traffic has some interesting arrangements and more solid melodies than fleeting hooks, making it a record that can actually withstand repeated rotations. This musical competency no doubt stems from the lessons learned from the founding members, vocalist/guitarist Chris Lehmann and drummer Adam Aaronson, from Heavy into Jeff and My Life with the Thrill Kill Kult, respectively. Bassist Mike Kelly and guitarist Andy Shaw then joined, and while the completed band doesn't, as they hoped, "reinvigorate popular music," they do manage to add a very listenable album to the mix.

Aaronson's powerful drumming and the feel-good riff compete for the spotlight on the opening title track, and some decidedly metal-sounding guitars in the background back the forceful chorus. The album loses some momentum with "Downtown Dream," a lifeless tirade against Hollywood shallowness, and a few other tracks unfortunately dwell on attempting to say something new and bad about that much-criticized plastic scene. However, the album redeems itself with solid musicianship throughout, especially noticeable on the rocking "Mi Amigo" and the bouncy "Highway." A good, easily digestible listen with all the right ingredients, just not the one that makes it stand out and be something special. B- (Michael Delano)

VARIOUS ARTISTS
The I-10 Chronicles
Back Porch Records

To quote the liner notes: "It seems that not many people are recording 'road songs' anymore, let alone complete albums about 'em. Well, in 1999 a few folks got together and decided it was time to do a record about a certain road that was near and dear to their hearts."

The result is a thorough, charming collection of thirteen classic and original songs about the open road. Don't worry too much about the cliched theme – these are excellent tunes written and recorded by some of the finest names in American music. Contributors range from Willie Nelson to Adam Duritz (of Counting Crows), with extensive appearances by country and folk veteran Joe Ely and a guest appearance by Emmylou Harris. Relative newcomers are also represented in vocalists Sarah Nicole Cherokee Rose and Meredith Marshall.

Such a wealth of talent and experience produces incredibly tight playing and outstanding musicianship; "Saint Valentine," the fourth track, punctuated by the interplay of accordion and mandolin, stands out as a flawless meeting of complementary musical personalities. Other highlights include the bluesy, New Orleans flavor of "Black Magic Woman," which features the stunning harmonica work of Charlie Musselwhite.

The I-10 Chronicles is an album with something for anyone at least remotely interested in country, folk, and blues music, produced by a collection of committed, veteran musicians. A- (David Troupes)

7TH HOUSE
412
Blackbird/Atlantic

7th House is alternative rock that actually rocks. Some wah-wah guitar and the lines "I got no money/I spent it all on a big black Cadillac/Yeah honey/We're gonna ride ride ride like Kerouac" kick off the fun and energy that starts on "Gypsy Queen" and persists for the duration of 412's eleven tracks. This debut album covers all kinds of territory, and well. Lyrics range from happy girlfriend ballads to silly Claypool-esque nonsense to personal confessions of life lessons learned. Musical terrain is no less traveled, with "Song for Psycho" combining Primus-like bass with freestyle rap and DJ scratches, while the rocking "Gypsy Queen" is simply a prime slice of premium rock.

7th House is comprised of only two Pittsburgh artists, Sky and Walter, who handle all of the instrumentation on 412, with guest DJs and various other contributors. The band also employs a touring drummer, but it really is amazing that a sound this full came from just two people. The album has the undeniable feel of a group effort, and it's clear that there is a strong kinship between the two artists that shines brightly through their music. Listen to Walter's triumphant guitar complement Sky's hopeful vocals on "Dirty Laundry," or witness how either member is happy to let the other take center stage. Sky's vocals and lyrics are the focus of the beautiful "Man from Amsterdam," but during the next song, "Don't Push Your Luck," plenty of time is allocated to Walter's impressive soloing. An excellent debut, and hopefully we'll be hearing more from this duo in the future. A- (Michael Delano)

SUMACK
Now Hear This
V2

Sumack's laid-back, down-home style is described by the band as "junk rock," but this junk has some value. Experimentation and weird-ass compositions are the name of the game here, and after a few songs the listener is just content to go with the odd musical flow and enjoy such blissfully meaningless lines as "my emphysema, she's a diva."

Singer/guitarist Mark McAdam's vocals are nothing extraordinary; they pretty much blend in with your current vocalists from less creative alternative bands, but Sumack is really all about the music. It's impossible to list all of the sounds that rear their head over the course of the album – they're too numerous and half the time I didn't know where the hell they came from. But they all sound good, at the very least interesting, even though the album does tend to drag at times, although mixing things up with female vocals on "Downfall Days" helps to keep the listener interested. At times the band meanders around a little too much with their sound, but when they do focus, like on the great "re: Saturday," you catch a glimpse of what potential lies in a more directed attempt. C+ (Michael Delano)

ing the toast is all the more priceless due to the fact that Tony and all the boys know that he is just being set up for a fall, but the scene takes it one brilliant step further. Mounted on all the caterers' nametags are tiny cameras that record the entire event, complete with all of the conversations and new Mafia standings. The scene flows artfully from a tongue-in-cheek celebration of Junior's position to the realization that Tony and the gang have nothing to be smug about, since the FBI is one step ahead.

4. Tony carries Junior from the house, Episode 15 – Do Not Resuscitate

My only pick from the second season (which I am sure would be different if I had seen all thirteen), this scene highlights the incredible human element that "The Sopranos" manages to keep alive amidst all of the pride and violence. Junior slips in the shower and realizes he is in serious trouble. When Tony is called and arrives to see what is up, Junior is in bad shape, and needs to get to a hospital. One of Junior's new cronies is there, but Junior doesn't trust him at all, so Tony is the one in charge. Tony convinces Junior, who knows its in his best judgment, to let Tony take him to the hospital and orders him not to tell anyone that he needed to be carried to the car, to which Tony replies simply with a stare. This very emotional scene is filled with themes, such as pride, loyalty, and forgiveness, since only a few episodes earlier, Junior had ordered his now-savior's death.

3. Livia has a stroke, Episode 13 – I Dream of Jeannie Cusamano

After finding out that his mother and Junior jointly put a hit out on him, Tony goes seeking revenge. Junior simply lucks out and is arrested before Tony can get at him. Heading then to thank his mother for the favor, Tony encounters her being wheeled into Intensive care as she supposedly had a stroke. Tony rightfully isn't buying any of it and even sees his mother smiling at him through the oxygen mask as he informs her that he knows everything and that she will get hers. The movement and humor in this scene makes for a great atmosphere; fans have been waiting all season for Tony to confront his treacherous mother about the hit on him, and when he does it's played out with all the adrenaline it deserves.

2. Carmela and Father Phil, Episode 5 – College

While Tony is accompanying Meadow on a college search, as well as taking care of some business of his own, Carmela is home looking for love in all the wrong places, namely the family's minister Father Phil. Carmela craves both reassurance that she is a good person and male companionship from the Father, and on one particular night, their companionship almost transcends that particular term. By the fireplace, Father Phil gives Carmela the sacrament in a scene that is shot with enough symbolism to drown even the most savvy in a pool of metaphors. When Father Phil rejects Carmela's more ambitious advances, however, Carmela realizes, although doesn't state until later, that Father Phil simply uses women and has no intention of returning any of their affections. This scene is not only very daring in its portrayal of a somewhat lustful priest, but also completely sincere in showing the complexities and needs of Carmela and the regrettable poor methods in which she goes about fulfilling them.

1. Anthony Jr. realizes Tony is in the Mafia, Episode 4 – Meadowlands

This is the scene, and episode, that got me completely hooked on The Sopranos, after being only a casual fan for the first three episodes. The former boss has died of cancer, and Tony's real family and mob family converges at the funeral. Previously, Tony's son Anthony Jr. has been informed by his sister that his dad is a mobster, pointing out all of the painfully obvious clues. Suspicious but not totally convinced, Anthony Jr. realizes the truth, complete with a "told you so" glance from his sister, at the funeral as he witnesses his father being paid respect by all of the other "family" members. Add to this the FBI taking pictures of the funeral from a distance and a wink Tony gives his son that is not nearly as harmless as he assumes. This is simply an exceptional scene that solidifies the status of The Sopranos as one of the most engaging, enjoyable, and rewarding entertainment experiences ever on a screen.

■ family

Christopher Moltisanti (performed passionately by Michael Imperioli), is a young, hot-tempered hitman who, despite his juvenile behavior, Tony embraces like a son. Chris yearns to "get made" but must prove his devotion (he spends his past time writing mafia oriented screenplays and sniffing coke by the eightball) and maturity to the family.

So, with the facets of the typical and atypical modern life in place, The Soprano's emerges around the contrasting characteristics of family dysfunctionalism, indentured homicide, interpersonal mobster relations, the dynamics of psychotherapy and palpably portrayed pop culture.

David Chase, the producer/writer/director/creator of The Soprano's, built the series around the doleful memories of his own recently deceased mother. Growing up as an Italian-American in New Jersey, he developed a rich sense of iconoclastic humor, a passion for American cinema and distaste for conventional primetime drama. After a lengthy career with as a scriptwriter and camera scribe, his apparitions for creating a cutting-edge, darkly comedic show have manifested with the intensity and fervor of great gangster films. His deeply original yet sordidly realistic and even empathetic character depictions are crafted and quernly halting the schemes, lawlessness and productivity of the Waste Management business, which is the crime family's occupational front. So goes the Soprano lineage into its second year of high drama.

Without spoiling any of the magic from this season, it is fair to say that my expectations were only to keep watching to see what happens. However much to my bewilderment, the beauty and luminosity of the first 13 shows were enhanced and expounded upon in the next 13, resulting in viscerally poetic and astonishingly brilliant television. Fogettaboutit!

Grade for the entire series: A

Sopranos" tormenting myself over whether Tony Soprano is a God or a common piece of trash. I'm still not sure. Vito Corleone is certainly a complex character, but compared to Tony Soprano, even he is inferior. You know so much more about Soprano's life than you will ever know about Corleone. The Godfather immediately expects you to respect Corleone, but it doesn't really allow you to understand why. This is something that "The Sopranos" makes abundantly clear.

The supporting cast of both "The Sopranos" and The Godfather are what make it something special. Now, simply because The Godfather's supporting cast is made up of Al Pacino, Robert Duvall, James Caan, and Diane Keaton, does not automatically make it better than "The Sopranos." The supporting cast of "The Sopranos" is simply incredible. Edie Falco is by far the best female actor on television, and Michael Imperioli, who plays Chris Moltisanti, deserves an Academy Award, let alone an Emmy, for what he does. The entire series is based on a strong bond of characters that must live, work and fight together in order to survive. "The Sopranos" does this in a much better way than The Godfather did. The Godfather needed quickly to establish character ties to each other because it was a film that would be over in a matter of hours. "The Sopranos" has taken entire seasons to give you a chance to decide which characters you trust and which you don't. You can immediately begin to identify with some people in a way that The Godfather simply does not convey.

Both films have marvelous casts that strongly push their stories to the highest levels. We must not forget that the people are all based on characters that have been written by a tremendous writer. Though Mario Puzo was a legend, I believe that David Chase will be as influential before his time is up.

As I've stated before, "The Sopranos," is better than most films that I've seen. I honestly believe that if you took the series and condensed it to a 2.5 hour-long movie, it would be even better than The Godfather. Since "The Sopranos" is an enormous constitution of television greatness, if you were to take the highlights out of the two years that it has been running, I think that it would be one of the greatest films ever made. I am certainly not saying that there is anything wrong with The Godfather. As a matter of fact, I am a strong supporter in the claim that it is one of the greatest films ever made.

However, when we as Americans rank the absolute best pieces of entertainment greatness, I am certain that David Chase's "The Sopranos" should rank higher than Mario Puzo's The Godfather.

"Fail Safe" and WWF Football

CBS Premieres Live TV Movie "Fail Safe"

CBS did its bravest thing since canceling "Picket Fences" last Sunday. It broadcasted the TV movie "Fail Safe" live. Following in the footsteps of "ER" and its venture into live television, the movie, based on a book published in 1962 and re-published last year, both times becoming a best-seller, showed last Sunday at nine o'clock. Written by Eugene Burdick and Harvey Wheeler, the story deals with a U.S. bomber that has received the wrong order from a top of the line, state of the art computer to drop two nuclear bombs on Moscow. Once the U.S. government learns of their misguided aircraft, they do everything in their power, including joining forces with the Soviet government, to stop the plane.

The show, produced by "ER" vet George Clooney, took an enormous chance on pulling this off – it included not only a live broadcast but also the incorporation of top level actors such as George Clooney, Richard Dreyfuss, Don Cheadle, Noah Wyle, James Cromwell, Sam Elliot and Harvey Keitel. Did it pay off? Well, the story is gripping and I can see why both in 1962 (the height of the tensions by both the U.S.S.R. and the U.S. as shown through the Cuban missile crisis) and last year it rose on the bestseller lists across the country. And with the cast that it had, how could you go wrong? But it didn't come off to be the event that CBS had made it out to be. It was filmed in black & white, which was meant to capture the era's style. However, in today's society of colorized classics like "I Love Lucy" and The Maltese Falcon, black and white anything doesn't go along well with modern audiences. Also, it was shown in wide-screen format, which was obviously meant to show all the characters and their movements and reactions during such emotional moments in the film. I don't mind wide-screen, but many others will turn off any movie in which those two black bars cover the bottom and top of their screens.

Because they were performing it live, the director set it up as if it were a play, with little stage direction and emphasis on speech and facial gestures. It was a script-based drama, lacking any top of action scenes between characters, besides emotionally fueled speeches. Additionally, because of the lack of action, the film was almost as if CBS had taped a play, and shown it on television, focusing on characters during their most important decisions and speeches.

Despite the excellent actors that were in the film, many of their performances were not as good as they could have been, because it was live. Most of the actors seemed to be doing their best to speak the lines and seem real, but weren't actually coming across as convincing; it was as if they were trying too hard to be believable. The film, although created on an excellent idea, that of a live TV movie and a great suspense and character drama, never got to the point where it was engrossing. Those who came in to chat and see what I thought of the show complained that they couldn't get into it and that the acting was stale. "Fail Safe" reminds us why TV movies aren't live.

The XFL/NBC Deal

Over two months ago, World Wrestling Federation owner and CEO, Vince McMahon, announced that he would be starting a new football league that would run from February to April starting in 2001. Stating he remembered when football was a real sport and not plagued by "unnecessary" rules and instant replays, he still sees it as Oliver Stone did in his recent fumble Any Given Sunday, a sport of sparring animals. McMahon said, "I miss that real, rugged type of football. These days, the NFL is so over regulated it's pasteurized... The league is turning gladiators into choirboys! There is no regard for individuality." McMahon wants to bring back the true essence of the sport. He says that he wants players to start doing end zone, sack, and other good play dances (that include but are not exclusive to the slashing-of-the-throat movement), to "express themselves".

What does he intend to do? The XFL (Extreme Football League) some rules that have been decided so far is that, the receiving team on kick-off or punt can no longer wave off the opposing team, as well as, a faster play clock. McMahon has also promised to take the audience inside the huddle, following the failed Arena Football by placing cameras and mikes in the huddles and sidelines. He also plans for there to be entrances, similar to the ones he has for his wrestling superstars, for the starting lineups of the teams. Also their are rumors that there will be no mandatory drug testing for the athletes, which means Lawerence Taylor is jumping for joy, knowing that he still has a future.

Tube Notes with Nicholas Pizzolatto

To the surprise of many, NBC has agreed to go 50/50 with Vince with the XFL, taking the financial burden off of his shoulders, by not only carrying the games in primetime on Saturday, but also sharing the rights to teams and other factors that have yet to be named. Starting next year the XFL will begin after the Super Bowl and finish in late April, recruiting has already started via the internet and the XFL official website, www.xfl.com, in which the web-masters are asking for only those serious to respond. McMahon said in a press release, that he wants "former college players who didn't get their chance to make it in the NFL, and possibly some athletes who were not fortunate enough to attend college at all" to register to play for the XFL. What do you think? Do you think that the lack of rules and regulations will be good or bad for the sport? Will this actually succeed? Do people actually want to see more action and violence? Is Vince just doing this because he can? Is NBC crazy for going in on this and putting it on primetime?

E-mail me your opinions on these questions and others comments at tubenotes1@hotmail.com the official e-mail for Tube Notes. Your opinions will be voiced in next week's column, as well as, all the other goings on in the world of television.

Director James Tobak looks resilient as he delivers extraordinarily powerful messages in his film Black and White

Examining our racist world

By Annie Sampsel
Daily Kent Stater

(U-WIRE) The film Black and White is a racially centered collage of culture, sex, crime and money. The most interesting thing about this film is the amazing cast of characters which has drawn on the talents of models, professional athletes, musicians and even some well-known actors. Writer/Director James Toback took a unique approach to this free-flowing film by having his cast improvise much of the dialogue resulting in some truly spontaneous and realistic acting.

The movie centers on a group of wealthy white teenagers from Manhattan's Upper East Side who find themselves drawn to hip-hop music and culture, and they immerse themselves in that culture despite their parents' and background. They include spoiled rich girl Charlie (Bijou Phillips), confused Wren (Elijah Wood), the estranged son turned criminal Will (William Lee Scott), his brother Eddie (Thomas) and Raven (Gaby Hoffmann). These kids fascinate filmmaker Sam Donager (a good role performed impressively well by Brooke Shields) and her quite apparently gay husband, Terry (Robert Downey Jr.), who capture the cultural identity crisis with their camera in documentary form, giving the movie a documentary feel as well. Both Sam and Terry make passes at Mike Tyson, who plays himself in the film, resulting in some of the most humorous scenes.

Meanwhile black gangster Rich Bower (played by rap artist Power of Wu-Tang Clan) is a recovering criminal trying to deal with the white manager of a recording studio (James Toback) and white music executives to promote his rap group. Bower's group includes other Wu-Tang Clan members Method Man and Raekwon.

Rich's best friend, Dean, played by real life New York Knick's forward Allan Houston, is a college basketball player dating a beautiful and intelligent graduate student (Claudia Schiffer) who is doing her dissertation on race. She has little advice to give when Dean is approached by a corrupt cop (Ben Stiller) who offers him $50,000 to throw his next game and betray Rich in a particularly far-fetched and awkward stretch of the plot.

Though the plot as a whole is an unoriginal and sketch attempt to connect the characters, it is acted well by an incredibly diverse array of pop culture icons. Virtually all the characters are interesting; however, there are too many of them to concentrate with depth on any one.

The same could be said of the movie's themes. All the aspects of race relations and culture touched upon in this film are fascinating but lack any real explanation, solution or sense of closure. Ideologically, the film goes nowhere and neglects to present any satisfying messages on the issues with which it deals.

The purpose of the film seemed to be to tear down the wall that separates black and white, while in the end all it really does is chip away a few bricks to let us peer through.

Ben Folds Five begins spring tour Hartford stop proves to be "stellar"

April 11, 2000

Tuesday night Ben Folds Five began their sSring 2000 tour at the University of Hartford Sports Center. The trio from Chapel Hill, known for their unique infusion of piano into pop music, captivated the small but fanatic crowd with a long and varied set. Ben Folds Five, who formed in North Carolina in 1994, released their self-titled debut album the following year and created a loyal fan base. In 1997 the band released their first major label album with Sony, Whatever and Ever Amen, which included the hit "Brick". Now Ben Folds, Robert Sledge, and Darren Jessie are touring in support of their third studio album, The Unauthorized Biography of Reinhold Messner, released last year.

The set list Tuesday night certainly showcased the new album while neglecting some older songs that were usually commonplace at Ben Folds Five shows. Even without all the usual songs, the energy that a Ben Folds Five show has been, know for was definitely present.

The show opened with the song "One Angry Dwarf and 200 Solemn Faces", a single off Whatever and Ever Amen, which showcased Ben Folds' impressive skills on the piano. They then proceeded to play a few slower songs off the last two albums before increasing the tempo with "Best Imitation of Myself" off the first album. Shortly after came an energetic rendition of "Your Redneck Past," which included Robert Sledge on a synthesizer and Ben Folds on an electric accordion. The most memorable song of the night, "Philosophy," sustained the high energy and produced an intense ending with Ben Folds playing the piano with his own stool. The song "Narcolepsy" also excited the crowd with Ben Folds' antics as he came crashing across the stage and turned an otherwise slow song into something more at home at a punk show. Ben Folds later provided more comic relief by breaking into "Video Killed the Radio Star" after teasing the crowd with the opening ten seconds of "Brick". They then ended the set with "Underground" instead of the expected "Song for the Dumped" and returned to the stage for an encore playing "The Last Polka" and "Uncle Walter".

Overall, the show was a solid representation of what Ben Folds Five has to offer. At times, the small crowd gathered in the gymnasium created the atmosphere similar to that of a high school dance; Ben Folds Five, however, still gave the stellar performance we've come to expect from them.

Ripken eyes a new milestone; Ironman approaches 3,000 hits

By Ken Rosenthal
Baltimore Sun

KANSAS CITY, MO - Six members of the Orioles' 1983 world championship team were at Kauffman Stadium last night, working as coaches, broadcasters, even volunteer batting-practice pitchers.

Cal Ripken is the only member of that team still active, and the memories flowed freely before he moved within five hits of 3,000 with a second-inning home run against Kansas City.

Memories of Ripken as a skinny youngster. Memories of his early struggles. Memories of his first signs of greatness, and his father's powerful influence.

"The first time I saw him, he was catching batting practice in Asheville, NC, in 1974," said former Orioles second baseman Rich Dauer, now a third base coach for the Kansas City Royals. "He was 15 years old, 6 feet tall, with curly hair. His dad was throwing batting practice. He was catching it. (Ripken's brother) Billy was the clubhouse kid. (Ripken's sister) Ellen was the base sweeper.

"I had no idea who he was. I thought he was a player."

Former Orioles pitcher Mike Flanagan caught his first glimpse of Ripken a few years later. Cal Ripken Sr., was the Orioles' third base coach. Junior was a pitcher and shortstop at Aberdeen High School.

"I remember seeing him come to the ballpark to take batting practice," said Flanagan, now a broadcaster for Home Team Sports. "The next time I saw him - it must have been two years later (after Ripken signed with the Orioles) - it seemed like he was a different kid. He was like 5 inches taller, and 20 to 30 pounds heavier.

"You looked at his dad, and figured he wasn't going to be that big. When he came back, it was a shock how big he had gotten, how strong. I almost didn't recognize him."

Former Orioles pitcher Mike Boddicker also had trouble identifying Ripken at the start, but for different reasons. The first time he met Ripken in Bluefield, WVA, he figured his new teammate might be a future Cy Young award winner.

"Helluva pitcher," said Boddicker, who now throws batting practice for the Royals part-time. "In rookie ball, we lived in the same house. The first time I saw him was on the hill. He was throwing on the side. He also took some balls at shortstop. But he was little, real skinny. I didn't think he was a shortstop. I assumed he was a pitcher. He had the best stuff of any guy down there."

That was 22 years ago.

Before Ripken converted from third base to shortstop. Before he became the American League Rookie of the Year and a two-time Most Valuable Player. Before he broke Lou Gehrig's consecutive-games record.

Any day now, he will become only the seventh player in major-league history to reach 400 homers and 3,000 hits, but remember how it all started? Ripken was 7-for-60 on May 1 of his rookie year. At that point, his major-league average over two seasons was .121.

"Failure was not in his jargon. It was not part of his game," Dauer said. "When he came up and started slowly, I remember him sitting in the clubhouse one day, very upset, crying. But you have to smell failure and have the fear of it to be a successful player. He never rested on any of his laurels. He always worked hard."

The day after Ripken sunk to 7-for-60, he finally managed two hits -and was promptly beaned by fellow rookie Mike Moore. He missed only one game and began his consecutive-games streak four weeks later. After the beaning, he batted .281 to the end of the season.

"I don't know when it was exactly, but there was an at-bat he had against Tom Seaver in Chicago," Flanagan said. "It was one of those things that really stuck in my mind, like Eddie (Murray) the first time he faced (Nolan) Ryan.

"Seaver threw the kitchen sink at him. It was a great at-bat. Cal fouled off a number of pitches, and ended up hitting a home run. I thought, 'That was special. This is going to be special.'"

Boddicker got the same feeling in '83, when Ripken led the majors with 211 hits, a club record that still stands. No Hall of Fame shortstop has ever had that hits many in a season, though the total has since been exceeded twice by Alex Rodriguez and once by Derek Jeter.

"I remember (Al) Bumbry screaming at one pitcher, 'Throw him a hook! Throw him a hook!'" Boddicker recalled. "I can't remember who it was. But the pitcher threw him a pretty good breaking ball, and Cal hammered it over the left-center-field bullpen at Memorial Stadium. It was a tough pitch. But he hammered it like it was nothing."

And now here's Ripken, all these years later, closing in on 3,000.

Elrod Hendricks is the Orioles' bullpen coach, just as he was in '83, Eddie Murray, the runner-up to Ripken for AL MVP that season, is another Orioles' coach. Terry Crowley, a teammate of Ripken's in '81 and '82, is the team's hitting instructor.

Those three will witness 3,000 regardless of where it happens, but Dauer and Boddicker will get only more two chances. Boddicker is a Little League coach and serves as an assistant coach for a local high school team. He isn't scheduled to be at the park tonight or tomorrow, but said he would cancel Little League practice if Ripken got close.

Dauer, the Royals' coach, said he wants to see his former double-play partner reach the milestone in Kansas City, even if it means that Ripken will finish the series with six hits against his current team.

History is history. And Dauer was present along with the rest of the '83 starting lineup when Ripken broke Gehrig's record at Camden Yards on Sept. 6, 1995.

"I don't get all misty-eyed or anything like that, but my heart was throbbing," Dauer said. "Then he breaks the record and runs around the stinkin' stadium. I could barely take it."

To Dauer, it mattered little that Ripken entered last night's game 3-for-18. He was struck by Ripken's competitiveness from the moment they met. And for nearly two decades, he has seen Ripken make the remarkable look routine.

"I hope he gets it," Dauer said. "Knowing him, he might get it tonight."

■ hockey

anyone not root for this guy. Besides, everybody loves Raymond.

Oh Canada, woe Canada. With teams heading for the sun-belt, Canada's small market teams are few and far between, and the people have spoken, voting against tax breaks for the Canadian NHL franchises. A devalued Canadian currency, small markets, if it's hard trying to run a competitive team when you can't afford it. On top of the fact that the defunct Quebec Nordiques bolted for Colorado and won a championship in their first season there after 20 plus seasons in Quebec. Toronto is Canada's sole realistic shot at the Cup. The Maple Leafs will be battling to restore some national pride to the place where hockey originated, and it'll be fun to watch them do it.

Don't feel like rooting for the underdogs? Then go with the favorite, the heavy weight, the St. Louis Blues. Juggernaut is an understatement. This team is undefeated when the score 3 goals in a game. St. Louis is the new Tiltetown USA. Kurt Warner and the Rams won the Superbowl. Mark McGwire won the homerun race, and the Blues won the Presidents Trophy for the best record in the NHL. The Blues have a high standard to live up to, and ever since the Pope visited St Louis in January 1999, St. Louis teams have been unbeatable.

And is any team has a chance against God, it's the New Jersey Devils. Perenially first round chokers and the only team in NHL history to win the Stanley Cup and not make the playoffs the next season, the Devils need to start living up to expectations. A dominant defensive force in the regular season, Martin Brodeur and his defense becomes quite porous in the post season. This defense first team should be able to hand Bure and the Panthers, because if they don't they'll be listening to the word choke for a long, long time.

So plenty of things to look for in this years Stanley Cup playoffs. Here are my quick picks and justifications. Flyers-Sabres: Flyers in 7. Philly is a team in turmoil, Buffalo is hot right now and Hasek is healthy. Philly has bigger stars and is just plain bigger. Did I mention Buffalo has Hasek? Caps-Pens: Caps in 5. Olaf Kolzig is back to the form he was in when he took the Capitals to the Finals. Lack of depth in Pittsburg and a smothering Washington defense will put the Penguins on ice. Leafs-Sens: Leafs in 4. Two offensive teams, but the Leafs have the heavier artillery. Senators are to inexperienced and they gave up Ron Tugnutt for Tom Barrasso, bad move. Leafs have Curtis Joseph and Mats Sundin and an offense that the Senators they had. Devils-Panthers: Devils in 6. New Jersey chokes every year, but this year all they have to do is shut down 50 percent of Florida's offense to win. Sound tough? Not really, when Bure is 50% of Florida's offense, literally.

If the Devil's can minimize Bure, the Panthers lose their bite. 20 goals on one? Doesn't sound tough, but then again it's 20 guys on Bure.

In the West, Blues-Sharks: Blues in 5. If any team can upset St. Louis it's San Jose. The Sharks have experience in giant killing, battling Detroit in the playoffs several times. But it'll be a tall task to knock off the Blues, but the Sharks are more experienced and it remains to be seen if Turek is a playoff goalie.

Stars-Oilers: Stars in 6. Two strong defenses, and two great goalies in Ed Belfour and Tommy Salo. But Dallas is deeper, more experienced, and healthy. They're also the defending champs, so they've got a lot on the line.

Avs-Yotes: Avs in 4. Mail this one in. Coyotes are struggling, and the Avalanche have Bourque. They also have more players that can score and play defense than the Coyotes, along with Patrick Roy in goal. Bourque in front of Roy, in the playoffs? Good luck Peyotes.

Wings-Kings: Wings in 5. Kings are a solid team, they trap, but that doesn't matter because Detroit is the definition of deep and talented. With a rested line-up the Kings will be facing a four lines of first line caliber players. The Kings also have the most former Bruins playing for them (Bryan Smolinski, Josef Stumpel, and Glen Murray), which means that Detroit will probably go on to the Finals or at least the next round.

Stanley Cup Finals: Colorado-Washington Colorado in 6.

Slow Giants in search of fleet feet

By Neil Best
Newsday

EAST RUTHERFORD, NJ - The grim reality had been creeping up for years, but it finally caught them from behind and strangled them in December during back-to-back routs at the hands of the St. Louis Rams and Minnesota Vikings.

The Giants are slow. Painfully, pathetically, almost comically slow. They are a team of dinosaurs in a league in which big, plodding species rapidly are becoming extinct.

"I don't think we have a lot of players who are fast for their positions," General Manager Ernie Accorsi understated.

Coach Jim Fassel said the problem is illustrated by a curious statistic. The Giants led the NFL with 52 drives of 10 or more plays in 1999 - eight more than the Super Bowl champion Ramsset finished 7-9.

By contrast, they ranked 27th in scoring drives of four plays or fewer, a category dominated by elite playoff teams.

The modern NFL favors explosive teams who score quickly, not efficient ones who march down the field patiently.

"Speed is the name of the game today," Fassel said.

So, beyond their needs at specific positions, the Giants' primary focus in this weekend's NFL draft will be adding players who can run.

They have adjusted some of their criteria for evaluating players, and in some cases will be willing to sacrifice size for quickness.

"Players change, so the system has to adjust to the players," Accorsi said. "Fassel is a passionate advocate of nimble, athletic players, notably on the offensive line. Accorsi said he and player personnel director Marv Sunderland are in "total agreement" with Fassel on the speed issue. Its importance was evident in the Giants' most high-profile big-money offseason acquisition: former Carolina Panthers linebacker Mike Barrow.

This mindset is relatively new for the Giants, who traditionally have favored big, powerful players who might thrive in the smashmouth NFC East and won't be intimidated by poor, late-season weather.

Just look at their recent draft history. In the past 10 years, 12 of their first-round picks and six second-rounders have come from the Big Ten or Notre Dame - Midwestern bastions of NFC East-brand football and late-season chills. Last year, five of their first-seven picks came from the Big Ten or Notre Dame, including the first two, Luke Pettigout and Ike Montgomery.

A leading candidate for this year's No. 1 pick, running back Ron Dayne, played at Wisconsin, and the Giants' favorite linebacker, Julian Peterson, is from Michigan State.

But, at least in theory, the Big Ten is evolving into a more athletic conference at the same time the Giants are.

Fassel said Dayne is faster than he appears for his size (5-11, 248 pounds), and Peterson has good quickness for his position.

It won't take much to upgrade the speed currently on the roster.

Among the fastest Giants in recent seasons have been receivers Brad Alford and David Patten, and cornerback Jason Sehorn.

Alford has caught only one pass for seven yards in two NFL seasons. Patten was not re-signed and now is a Cleveland Brown and Sehorn has battled serious leg injuries the past two years. The best young hopes among last year's rookies are running back Sean Bennett and kick returner Buster Livingston.

Accorsi said the premium on speed will not be lessened by the Giants' switch from artificial turf to grass for home games this season.

Plastic traditionally has been viewed as a boon to fast teams. Tom Accorsi said, "You have to play on what you play on."

The emphasis on speed will be particularly pronounced in the middle and later rounds, where there often is little to separate players remaining on the draft board, and where speed-oriented contributors often emerge. The key: return games reward speed handsomely.

Fassel said he has delivered this message to his staff about the draft: "You know what, guys, after the first heartthrob at each position is taken, let's not say who this guy would play and this guy can't play and that guy can't play. Find me some guys who can play. Some heart, some speed, some desire."

the Huskies, has an outfield surface that is close to being half-grass, half-astro-turf.

"It's not a big deal," Stone said. "That's just something you have to deal with.

Mike Kulak looks to keep a hot bat when the Minutemen travel to Boston today for an interstate game with Northeastern.

Rough commute does not quite Everett's bat

By Paul Doyle
Hartford Courant

BOSTON – The directions seemed clear to Carl Everett. Follow the Mass Pike into Boston, take Exit 22 and navigate a series of lefts and rights until you stumble upon Fenway Park.

How difficult could it be?

Somewhere in the heart of Copley Square, Everett learned his first lesson about his new home. He encountered speeding taxicabs, jaywalkers, and myriad one-way streets. Everett could see the stadium lights and the landmark Citgo sign in Kenmore Square, but he couldn't find the roads to his new workplace.

"I ended up all the way over by the (Charles) River," Everett said. "This city's a maze."

After attempting to follow the directions given to him by traveling secretary Jack McCormick, Everett called Fenway Park from his cellular phone. McCormick talked him through the streets of Boston and the Red Sox's new center fielder arrived at 10:30 a.m.

As it turned out, the chaotic commute was the worst part of Everett's day. Everett became an instant fan favorite with one of the more memorable Fenway debuts in recent history, as he homered twice and doubled in a 13-4 victory over the Twins.

In his first at-bat, Everett hit a pitch off righthander Joe Mays over the center field fence. With the Red Sox leading 10-2 in the sixth, Everett lined a pitch over The Wall against lefthander Mark Redman.

By the time he walked to the on-deck circle in the seventh, Everett was receiving a standing ovation.

"They're just showing appreciation," Everett said. "But I'm not going to get too overjoyed."

Surprised by his blase reaction? That's pure Everett – cool and detached off the field, fiery and passionate on it.

Everett said he enjoyed the atmosphere at Fenway, but he joked about the jagged outfield dimensions and seemed bemused by fans who played with beach balls in the bleachers. He said his Boston debut held no special significance and he refused to revel in his performance.

"I don't get too high or too low," Everett said. "You never want to get too excited. That's not my style. ... When I'm on the field, I show emotion. Off the field, it's just plain old Carl."

Facing Mays in the second, Everett batted from his natural left side. In his next two at-bats against Redman, he continued to bat left-handed. Everett said he often bats left-handed against left-handers, unless the pitcher is a hard thrower.

But before batting in the sixth, Everett was spurred on by injured teammate John Valentin.

"I came up here (in the clubhouse) and Val said, 'Why don't you hit one over the Green Monster?'" Everett said. "So I went up right-handed."

■ polo

February 26.

Senior All-American Katie Grogan led the Maroon and White attack in that matchup with a hat trick.

"Harvard is a scary team," McOsker said. "If they come into this thing with a lot of emotion, they've proven in the past that they can rise to the occasion if we're not ready."

What the Crimson hasn't proven in the past is that it can beat UMass with any degree of consistency: the Minutewomen are 10-3 all-time in action against Harvard.

And in all likelihood, UMass will be more than ready to hit the water with intensity and emotion this weekend. The team has not squared off with an actual opponent since last Wednesday, after its scheduled weekend contest with Villanova was cancelled due to organizational conflicts.

Even a tough inter-squad scrimmage on Saturday did little to satisfy the competitive desire of the Minutewomen, causing their coach to speculate that the layoff will probably help his team play better rather than hindering it.

"You could tell after practice today that we're really hungry to play another team," McOsker said yesterday. "All that time off actually helped our concentration."

The hiatus has also awarded UMass the opportunity to hone its game to a razor sharp edge. The team's already-devastating defense is now on par with the nation's best, thanks to intense practice on individual coverage and perimeter play.

"We've been working really hard to try and limit the number of ejections against us," McOsker said. "We're really starting to click defensively, and it all comes from our level of concentration."

That concentration has been made easier for the team's field players by the emergence of sophomore goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich. After setting the UMass single season record with 233 saves last year, the Golden State native has elevated her game this season to a new high.

"We're looking for Dana to continue being the backbone of our defense," McOsker said.

While the "D" has been dynamite in terms of blowing up opposing offenses, the Maroon and White offense has set off explosions of its own. While senior scoring machines Grogan, Marci Hupp and Claudia Clement have made the hat trick an expected norm for UMass, McOsker has made a priority of cleaning up the overall ball movement and possession skills of the squad.

"We've been working on controlling the ball better, and not allowing unforced turnovers," McOsker said. "That's an area where we've improved greatly."

After dominating most of this weekend's field over the first three months of the season, the new and improved Maroon and White squad should have little trouble wrapping up another New England title in Cambridge.

games every week in Florida. The pressure of the NFL will not get to him as he enters the league.

7) Arizona- Lewis Running Back, Tennessee. The Cardinals have not had a great running back since, well ever! The big question mark with Lewis is his health. he had knee surgery during his sophomore season and was able to recover to play well his junior year, but was not the same back after the knee surgery. He has wowed scouts at the combines and has moved from a late first round pick, to a top 10 pick. He probably should have stayed for his senior year, but will be a high pick based on his play before his knee injury. If he can fully recover, he will be a great NFL back.

8) Pittsburgh - Plaxico Burress, Wide Receiver, Michigan State. If everything falls as planned, the Steelers will get a steal at eight with the drafting of Burress. Burress is being compared to Keyshawn for his size and his ability to go up and get passes in the red zone. While he has a knack to be undisciplined on some plays, he is 6'6" tall with some breakaway speed. The only thing that he needs is a quarterback to throw him the ball.

9) Chicago- Brian Urlacher, Linebacker, New Mexico. His stock has gone up as well as the combines have continued. The Bears would take Dick "Night Train" Lane if he was available in the draft. Urlacher is a good size for a linebacker at 6' 3" and 258 pounds. He also runs a 4.6 40 and had 154 tackles, one sack, five tackles for loss, five fumbles caused, three recovered, seven passes broken up, an interception, 10 punt returns for 158 yards, three kickoff returns for 78 yards and seven catches for 61 yards and six scores while playing mostly in the red zone on offense. Now he will be a great fit in the Bears defense. Of course, I would be a great fit in the Bears' D.

10) Baltimore (From Denver)- Sylvester Morris, Wide Receiver Jackson State. Who you ask. Morris had 69 catches and 12 touchdowns last season. Impressed scouts with a 4.35 40 in the workouts. Also, his height (6' 3") makes him intriguing to a lot of scouts. Can go over the middle and run the sideline patterns. Problem might be with moving from Division 1-AA to the NFL. Ran sloppy routes in college, will get eaten alive if he does the same in the NFL. However, Jerry Rice has proven that 1-AA players can produce in the NFL.

McNulty has been named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll every semester, earned Academic All-America honors, and has made the Dean's List each term as well.

Probably the most energetic motivator on the team is Mike Alexander. His loud cheers can be heard over every other member of his team, and he is notorious for pumping up his squad during every meet. Fearing a loss to Temple going into the last rotation of ECAC's this year, Alexander confidently said, "Come on, guys. It's not over." He then jumped onto the high bar and brought in a career-high 9.65, tying him with Leis for the fifth highest all-time score. He holds a career-high 9.50 on vault, was named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll last semester, and was dubbed the ECAC Rookie of the Week last year.

Last, but certainly not least, is J.J. Hershey. The co-captain has a near-perfect 3.94 GPA and has tremendous talent on every event. He holds a career-high 9.55 on pommel horse and rings, and posted a career-high of 9.35 and 9.45 on the bars and high bar respectively.

The Pennsylvania native has been named to the Dean's List every semester and has received Academic All-America honors the last past two years. As a sophomore, Hershey was also honored as a College Gymnastics Association All-America Scholar Athlete.

So as anyone can see, the talent of the junior class is endless. All eight of them contribute a great deal to their team and are crucial to say the least. Their skills have improved tremendously over the years, and if their drive and determination continue this summer, there's no telling how far this class and the rest of the team can go.

Depleted defense makes Cup run that much more difficult for Leafs

Amongst all the excitement and anticipation for the upcoming National Hockey League playoffs, Curtis Joseph and the Toronto Maple Leafs quietly ponder their upcoming series. And hope.

The Leafs enter the playoffs as the third seed in the Eastern Conference, ready to do battle with the Ottawa Senators in the only playoff battle that involves two Canadian teams. Success is crucial for the Canadian teams, as they strive to remain in hockey's native country despite major financial woes.

For the Leafs, that means overcoming the most devastating injury, both physically and emotionally, that their franchise has suffered since defenseman Bill Barilko was killed in a plane crash in the offseason following his Stanley Cup-winning overtime goal in 1951.

When Bryan Berard crumbled to the ice courtesy of a Marian Hossa high stick on March 11 of this year, no one knew just how magnanimous an injury he had suffered. As team doctors escorted him from the ice with a bloody rag covering his face, fans cheered the injured young defenseman, expecting his return soon afterward. Only the next day did fans learn just how bad things were.

The Woonsocket, RI native had suffered a detached retina and a broken orbital bone in his right eye, and after two emergency surgeries, it is still uncertain as to whether he will regain sight in that eye, let alone play in the NHL again. Still, through it all, Berard remains hopeful that he will be able to resume his NHL career.

"I believe that I will see out of this eye and get back on that ice. With the support of my family, the Toronto organization and the fans I just have to have faith in God that he can bring me back my sight. I have to believe in that," he said in an interview earlier this month.

The Leafs were obviously distraught by the injury, and their next game against Chicago showed it. The Leafs were upended by the lowly Hawks by a score of 5-2. Their defense was incredibly porous, and with the exception of a second period goal by Greg Adams, they showed little offensive presence.

In fact, the only bright spot in the game came during a first period break in the action. As fans instinctively looked to the Jumbotron, the image of number thirty-four Matt Peach brought them to their feet. As the highlight reel continued, the cheers got louder and louder. Finally, the single sentence at the bottom of the scoreboard summed up the game nicely. "We miss you, Bryan."

Just how much they would miss Berard was determined over the next few weeks. The Leafs went 1-4-0 over their first five games without him, and finished the season on a subpar note, going 6-7-0 over the final 13 games. In that span, they allowed 42 goals and scored just 33.

Before Berard's injury, Toronto averaged one-half goal per game more than their opponents. After his injury, they averaged seven-tenths of a goal less than the teams they faced.

The only hope drawn from the season's final month were convincing victories over NHL powerhouses New Jersey and Detroit, yet the Leafs displayed their Jekyll and Hyde tendencies in losses to Ottawa and Chicago and slender wins over NHL also-rans the Islanders and Tampa Bay.

Going into this week's playoffs, the Leafs hopes rest purely on the shoulders of Joseph, who has played at a superhuman level in order to prevent the Leafs from falling behind Ottawa, who finished just five points behind them in the Northeast Division.

After Berard went down, Cujo faced an average of 32 shots per game, well above the league average of 28 shots per game. Yet Joseph came through in the stretch run, saving a strong 91 percent of those shots.

It is an old euphemism that the team with the hot goalie usually wins in the playoffs, and the story is no different for the Leafs. As long as Cujo stands tall, the Leafs will be in a position to win. But if he falls, they will fall hard and fast with him. And without his best defenseman, a goalie can only continue to play at an astronomical level for so long.

But for now, Cujo is flying high, and it will be the Senators duty to bring him down. And that task is made more difficult by the fact that he is playing for more than the Stanley Cup. As if that wasn't motivation enough, he is playing for the fans, for his country and most of all, for his friend and teammate.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – It may be difficult for you to open up to someone who is asking more of you than you are able to give. Ultimately, you're going to have to talk.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Now is no time to try to fool someone who knows you well – and perhaps even better than you know yourself! Honesty is required in every turn.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may be quite disappointed today when you catch a friend talking about you behind your back. Later on, the wound will be healed.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may have been doubting yourself in some respect over the past few days, but now you'll have reason to be more confident, even proud.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Before sharing those secrets with a loved one, consider what impression you really want to give. Are you sure it's the right time?

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Get closer to someone you love today and the gesture will be noticed and reciprocated. It may be time to make a new commitment.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – It's time for you to face the truth about a difficult personal situation. You may have to admit to others what you can't admit to yourself.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Take care that you follow instructions today when engaged in anything technical involving machinery of any kind. Errors may be hazardous.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – The chances for your success are increasing dramatically today, thanks to your own ability and a knack for thinking on your feet.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Trying to talk to someone who is unwilling to listen is not advised today, it's likely you'll only be adding fuel to an already blazing fire.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Your long day is likely to be even longer than expected when a friend comes to you in need of advice. An evening commitment may be involved.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Choose carefully when given any kind of choice today, as you may not realize how even the little things can add up to major importance in no time.

Playoffs here; premier players capture awards

The NHL's 82 game season has finally wound down and the table is set for the Stanley Cup playoffs. But it only took Pittsburgh's Jaromir Jagr 63 games to win the scoring title for a second consecutive season. Jagr captured the Art Ross Trophy with his league-leading 92 points.

Despite missing almost a third of the season due to injuries, Mario Lemieux's sidekick still managed to defend his scoring title. Florida's Pavel Bure was the next best thing, with a league-high 59 goals, but not enough helpers to beat out Jagr.

Other honors will be going to St. Louis' goalie Roman Turek, who will take home the William Jenning's Trophy for allowing the fewest goals in the league (and is also banking on taking home the Vezina as the league's top goalie), and teammate Chris Pronger who won the plus/minus race with a plus-52 and is the leading candidate to win the Norris Trophy as the league's best defenseman.

However, Jagr's personal victory is the NHL's loss, as this is the first time since the 1967-68 season that the NHL scoring leader finished below 100 points. The parity continues in the soon to be Original 30, and despite the gimmicky four-on-four overtimes, scoring is still down, and the 'Lords of the Boards' continue to market a ridiculously overpriced and boring product. Thank goodness that the Stanley Cup playoffs have arrived, where four-on-four nonsense will be banished, and the gimmicks have been erased from the league, at least for a few months. No offense meant to the minor leaguer's that populated teams like the Boston Bruins but we'll get to see enough of those guys when the league adds 40 or so more of them next season when hockey hotbeds, Minnesota (where the Dallas Stars defected from due to insufficient funding) and Columbus join the league. Thank goodness also that Commissioner Gary Bettman announced, in his State of the League address a few weeks ago, that there appears to be no further plans for expansion, i.e. dilution of the talent pool, on the horizon.

The match-ups have been set in stone and the Eastern Conference series look like this: Flyers-Sabres, Caps-Pens, Leafs-Sens, Devils-Panthers. While folks in the Wild, Wild West will get to see the Bluet-Sharks, Stars-Oilers, Avs-Yotes, Wings-Kings. However before the puck is even dropped, teams will first have to beat the injury bug that continues to prey on several on several teams.

The Flyers will begin the playoffs without former captain Eric Lindros, who remains on the sidelines with a concussion and a broken ego after Philly stripped him of his captaincy. The Buffalo Sabres may open their series without Doug Gilmour who is recovering from a nasty stomach virus. Luckily the Sabres still have Dominik Hasek to lean on, as Gilmour played a huge part in propelling the Sabres into the post-season with his leadership, which is a big commodity come this time of the year.

Meanwhile the Avalanche may be without Peter Forsberg, who is recovering from a shoulder injury. Sergei Zubov is also doubtful for the Dallas Stars, and Pavol Demitra will be providing emotional support for his Blues while he nurses a concussion.

If you're having a hard time on who to root for in this years playoffs, there hasn't been a better set of underlying soap opera's amongst the competing teams in years. Lindros needs it for personal pride, Toronto needs it for national pride, Ray Bourque just needs/deserves it, the Blues have to keep pace with the Rams, and the Devils need to avoid another big time choke.

Poor Lindros has been beaten badly, by his own team! Stripped of his C, replaced by Eric Desjardins, his character and bravery questioned by GM Bobby Clarke, and no longer trusted by his teammates. All this for a guy that's scored 659 points in 486 games, averaging 1.35 points per game. If anyone deserves a break its Eric, the big sensitive lug.

Meanwhile, Bourque, finally rescued from the sinking ship in Boston has been rejuvenated in the thin Colorado air. Pondering a return to the NHL next season that was doubtful in Boston, the former Bruins captain has inspired the Avs into winning their division and is looking for a return to the finals for the first time since the lights went out in the Boston Garden in the late 80's. After scoring 10 goals in 65 games with his Bruins, Bourque tallied 7 in 11 games with the Avalanche. In his 21st Cupless season, how can

Juniors lead men's gym into 2001

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Just like the Jeffersons, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team has been "movin' on up" the past few years.

Two years ago, the team shattered its former all-time team high score, setting a new record of 228.150. Last year, the Minutemen were crowned the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) Champions for the first time and went on to compete in the NCAA East Regional. This year, the Amherst boys came through and earned a spot at NCAA's.

A big contributing factor to the success of this young team was senior Jeff LaVallee, who has made headlines after almost every meet since the start of his collegiate gymnastics career.

However, there are many other contributing members on the team that have seemed to get overlooked by LaVallee's large shadow. These athletes put their heart and soul into what Sports Illustrated called "The World's Toughest Sport" and give 110 percent whenever they compete. And while there are many unsung heroes on this team, one particular group to take note of is the junior class.

Eight men strong, the junior class runs deep with talent. And that talent encompasses both athletic and scholastic ability. Besides being stellar athletes, virtually every one of them has been named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll for having a grade point average of 3.0 or better, and five of them have been placed on the Academic Dean's List. They come from six different states, have seven different majors, and are all quintessential members of the men's gymnastics team.

Belchertown native Eric Bacon has certainly made his presence known this year. He scored a career-high 9.50 on the floor exercise and swung his way to a 9.05 at ECAC's last month. And with an explosive vault at Temple University, Bacon brought in a career-high 9.70, which ranks him in a three-way tie for the fourth highest score ever to be posted by a UMass gymnast.

And when he's not breaking personal bests, he's hitting the books. It has certainly paid off, as the economics major has been named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll on four different occasions.

While Chad Bennett hasn't had much competition time at UMass, he is certainly a valuable member of the team. The 13th man in the lineup, Bennett has traveled to almost every meet and has been working at upgrading his routines. The Central Square, N.Y. native earned career-highs on floor (9.25) and vault (9.05) last year, and should be a strong competitor next year.

Next on the list is Exeter, NH product Claxton Kent. Entering UMass as mainly a tumbler, Kent has developed into a very well-rounded gymnast. Aside from the floor, where he ranks 10th for UMass with a 9.65, Kent has made impressions on other events as well. This year, he came through with a career-high 9.40 on vault at NCAA's and a career-high 9.40 on rings at the New England Championships. Kent has been named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll on more than one occasion, and has even made an appearance on the Academic Dean's List.

Suffield, CT native Andy Leis is one of the most talented gymnasts to come to UMass. Leis ranks fourth in UMass history in the all-around (55.45), is tied for ninth on the parallel bars (9.45), tied for fifth on high bar (9.65), second on pommel horse (9.85), and holds a career-high 9.60 on floor.

As a freshman, Leis was named the ECAC Rookie of the Year, UMass Rookie of the Year and was named to the Academic All-America team. The Sport Management major has also been listed on the Athletic Director's Honor Roll virtually every semester.

The other New Yorker on the gym team is Ben Kandel. Although talented on other events, the Syracuse native has contributed primarily on the still rings. He scored a career-high 9.40 on the event against Temple last year.

Focusing in on academics, the Resource Economics major was named to the Athletic Director's Honor Roll both semesters last year, and made an appearance on the Dean's List last fall.

When naming talented members of the junior class, it just wouldn't be right if Bryan McNulty weren't mentioned. One of the best tumblers UMass has ever seen, McNulty has made a long-lasting impression on floor and vault. Last year, the Springfield, VA native raked in a career-high 9.70 on floor, placing him in a tie for seventh in UMass history on the event. And this year, McNulty catapulted his way to a career-high 9.75 on vault, ranking him third on the list of all-time records.

Reedy ready for first collegiate start

There are two baseball scenarios that will play out today in the Boston area.

The first, a relatively insignificant one at that, matches the Boston Red Sox against the Minnesota Twins at Fenway Park. It's a game that, in a couple of weeks, will hardly matter.

The second, one that gives the phrase 'key game' an entirely new meaning, finds the Massachusetts baseball team hosting Northeastern University in a huge interconference match-up.

A Red Sox loss would hurt the feelings of starting pitcher Pete Schourek, but that's about all it would do. There's no sense of urgency for the Sox.

This is not to say that UMass is in a must-win situation with Northeastern. Because they're not. It's just that a triumph in Brookline today would do so much more than just add a mark to the Maroon and White's win column.

As of right now, the Minutemen stand at 12-11 overall and at 3-3 in the Atlantic-10. Hovering around .500 all season, UMass has only been able to up its record to two games above that mark. With a win today, not only would they get to two games above .500, but they'd also gain that much needed confidence and a positive springboard into this weekend's series with the Temple Owls.

If you take a look at the schedule, the Maroon and White are eight games away (four home, four away) from the Beanpot Tournament and another possible Huskie match-up.

"That's two weeks away, and we're not really worried about that," coach Mike Stone said. "No matter what, we just have to be prepared to make something positive happen every game."

When the underdog Minutemen take the Friedman Diamond today at 3 p.m., they will try to utilize their hats and send a quick message to the Northeastern defense. On Monday, Virginia Tech became the first team this season to shutout UMass, winning by an impressive 13-runs.

"I'm just disappointed that we didn't compete well enough," Stone said. "I mean it was a big game for us and we couldn't get it done."

Before that no-run performance against the Hokies, UMass was able to snatch a win from Virginia Tech two days before on an irregular day of weathered baseball, scoring six runs in the first game and 15 in the nightcap.

"They were two different days," Stone said. "I was pleased that we were able to make two come-backs, but [Saturday] was just a strange day. It's hard to judge competitiveness on a day like that."

Pat Reedy

Freshman Pat Reedy will be making his first start on the mound today for the Minutemen. Reedy has compiled a 1.59 ERA in four appearances so far this season.

"He pitched very well against Central Connecticut," Stone said. "We need to start giving the younger guys some innings, you know, throw more people in the mix. Plus, we have a lot of games coming up, and two weekend series'... so our pitchers need the rest."

Stone also said that he plans to pitch several hurlers today, including freshman Paul Washenko who will look to lower his 8.18 ERA.

The Northeastern attack is led by the America East Conference's player of the week Hernan Guerrero. The junior centerfielder led the Huskies last week, going 11-19 (.579) and hitting his sixth homer of the year while picking up five doubles and driving in five runs. Joining Guerrero is freshman Omar Pena, whose brother of Carlos who was selected by the Texas Rangers with 10th overall pick in the 1998 amateur draft.

Coming off of a weekend battle with the elements, UMass will once again have to deal with something other than the actual game. Friedman Diamond, home field to

UMass the class of New Englands

The women's water polo team looks to stay atop the east coast this season.

The Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) was formed so that the top teams in this up-and-coming sport could duke it out all season before fighting for regional bragging rights in an exciting championship tournament.

But by including the women of No. 11 Massachusetts in the mix, the CWPA unknowingly took most of the thrill out of its own finale.

UMass (22-6, 10-0 CWPA) is clearly the favorite to walk away with all the glory at this weekend's CWPA New England Championships, set to unfold at Harvard's Blodgett Pool. The Minutewomen will open tourney action at 9 a.m. on Saturday by squaring off with Wesleyan.

Maroon and White skipper Dan McOsker views the field at New Englands as more of a speed bump than a stumbling block, as his team looks ahead to the Eastern Championships and a run at its third consecutive Eastern crown.

"We're going to try to use this weekend to run some plays and work on some things to get ready for Easterns," McOsker said.

But looking too far ahead could be the kiss of death for the Minutewomen, as a number of the teams at New Englands will have sweet revenge on their minds after humbling losses to UMass earlier in the season. Three teams in particular, Dartmouth, Brown and the host Crimson, all have the memory of prior defeats as a motivating force this weekend.

The Big Green of Dartmouth, 0-2 in a pair of matchups with UMass this year, can earn a rematch with the Maroon and White by besting MIT in its first-round melee.

But considering the scores of the two previous UMass/Dartmouth contests, the Big Green might be better off staying away from McOsker's crew altogether: UMass outscored Dartmouth by a jaw-dropping 37-1 margin in the two victories, 16-0 on March 18 and 21-1 on March 26.

The Bears of Brown are all-too familiar with just how devastating a date with the Minutewomen can be: the Maroon and White has bested its Rhode Island rivals a staggering six times this season. The last four meetings between the two teams have been anything but exciting, with the Minutewomen ending up on the high end of scores like 16-6, 14-2, 12-4 and 11-2.

"We've beaten Brown pretty handily every time we've played them this year," McOsker said. "We're not all that concerned about playing them again."

In a more likely scenario, Sunday's finals will pit McOsker's troops against Harvard. UMass has outclassed the Crimson in a trio of battles this season, the closest being a 9-3 win at the Princeton Invitational on

Brown v. Arrington; PSU defense rests case

The time has come for the NFL draft this Saturday in New York. Over 200 players will have a dream realized, while others will go through two days of torture while waiting for their names to be called. For some, that will be the case.

However, other players will not have to wait long to hear their names called by NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue. The draft status of players such as: Florida State's Peter Warrick, Penn State's LaVar Arrington and Courtney Brown and Tennessee's Jamal Lewis has been debated about over the last couple of months.

David Rose on the NFL Draft

The Draft is now just 2 days away, and with the trade of Keyshawn Johnson to Tampa Bay, the Jets will be the first team since the NFL-AFL merger to have four first round picks...that is if they keep all of them. There is also a possible trade of Corey Dillon from Cincinnati to Baltimore. A lot has changed in terms of the status of the top 10 draft picks.

The Draft started off with one name at the top of the list, Warrick. However, after a sub-par workout in front of scouts, with his 40-yard sprint clocked at 4.55 seconds, Cleveland has already said that their choice is down to either Arrington or Brown. Warrick should not have to wait long to hear his name called as he will lead a first round that could see as many as seven receivers drafted.

The Cleveland Browns have been on the clock for four months, and it is almost time for their pick.

Here is how I see it going for the first 10 selections.

1) Cleveland- Brown, Penn State. When Paul Tagliabue says, "With the first pick in the draft," everybody expects them to take Brown or Arrington. While Arrington will be the better player in the NFL with his superior leaping ability and speed, he is still not as good as he could be. Brown has an 86-inch wingspan and at 270 pounds has linebacker's speed, and is a mature player after playing four years with the Nittany Lions. The Browns need a lot of help and they want to take a player who will make an impact immediately on a team that allowed 437 points last year, the third most in the league. If want to maybe wait a year for potential, then they will take Arrington. However, the Browns need an impact player, and that is why they will take Brown at number one, but they won't go wrong with either player.

2) Washington- Arrington, Penn State. The Redskins have made the biggest moves during the off-season. They picked up Bruce Smith after the Bills unceremoniously released him. They also picked up quarterback Jeff George to back up Brad Johnson. Their biggest move was trading the 12th and 24th pick to the 49ers and picked up the number three draft pick. Now they can fill two huge holes that showed in the fourth quarter of their playoff loss to Tampa Bay last season. At number two, they will take Arrington. The defense has picked up Smith, but Arrington will help out a weak linebacking group. This pick is a no brainer.

3) Washington (From San Francisco)- Chris Samuels, Left Tackle, Alabama. The Redskins offensive line couldn't have opened up a hole for a flea in the game against Tampa, and Johnson was on the ground more than Rocky Balboa was in his movies. This is another no brainer as Samuels did not allow a sack last year and was the Outland Trophy winner as best lineman in college football last year. Gives support to Johnson on his blind side.

Note to Samuels: do not turn into a long snapper. One bad snap for Owner Daniel Snyder and you swim back to D.C. Just ask Dan Turk.

4) Cincinnati- Warrick, Florida State. The Bengals franchise needs a shot in the arm after being shot the last 4 seasons. With more players wanting to be traded than actual victories for the franchise, the team needs some star quality. Warrick gives them that. Forget the 4.5 40-yard dash at the combines. If anyone thinks that he can only run 4.5 is crazy. His performance against Virginia Tech in the Sugar Bowl is all you need to see about his potential. He brings them a deep threat for quarterback Akili Smith and a dangerous punt returner. It also solves one of their problems should they choose to get rid of wideout Carl Pickens. In a draft with four running backs expected to go in the first round, if the Bengals get the 13th pick from the Ravens for Dillon, they can afford to wait to get one at that slot.

5) Baltimore- Corey Simon Defensive Tackle, Florida State. If the trade for Dillon goes through the obvious spot for the Ravens will be on the defensive side of the ball. With the arrest of Ray Lewis, the suspension of Defensive Tackle Larry Webster and with Tony Siragusa maybe retiring, the Ravens need a stud on defense that will at least fill one of the holes on that team. If healthy, Simon would be a great pick-up for Baltimore to play with fellow Seminole alum Peter Boulware. Health is his only troublesome spot as he has had five surgeries in his playing days. If the trade for Dillon does not occur with Cincinnati, look for the Ravent to take a running back, preferably Thomas Jones from Virginia or Lewis from Tennessee.

6) Philadelphia- Travis Taylor, Wide Receiver, Florida. The logical choice would be Burress, but the Eagles have already said that they are not interested in drafting him, so they will go with Taylor. He is a tremendous route runner with good speed and great hands. He has great separation speed and played in big

Senate debates safety issues

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The issues of the possible installation of surveillance cameras in the Southwest living area and of the projected campus-wide budget cuts were the primary focus of yesterday's faculty senate meeting.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian spoke out against the cameras at the meeting, suggesting to the senators that there were better ways to go about making the campus a safer place.

"Myself and other student leaders are concerned about safety," Avakian explained, but that they felt that adding an extra security van to the already existing route or hiring a professional security staff may be the proper way to go about achieving the goal.

He went on to say that the cameras themselves would be an invasion of privacy and that overall students were against their implementation. He cited the recent ballot question, which suggested that cameras be installed in dormitories, commenting that students voted the question down by a four to one margin. He explained that installing these cameras would make the towers in Southwest feel like prisons.

"The students have spoken very loudly and very clearly that they are against this," Avakian said. "I don't think that it would be easy to teach to a student that feels as though they live in a prison."

Javier Cevallos, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, explained that for many students the implementation of these cameras represented increased campus safety.

"We have received a significant number of phone calls from students that would actually like to see cameras in buildings," Cevallos commented.

One faculty senator made the comment that security cameras were added to the library following assaults that took place in the building several years ago. He explained that following the implementation of the cameras that the building remained free of crime.

"The minute that we installed that camera, things were stopped," he said.

Avakian responded to that by explaining that the library was a public building whereas the dormitories were private residences where students resided.

"I am not forced to live in a library," Avakian said. "If a government agency forced you to put a camera in front of your home I am sure that you would feel differently."

Also discussed during the meeting were the potential budget cuts and the appropriate way to go about lobbying for support from the Board of Trustees.

Senator Brian O'Connor explained to those in attendance what had transpired at the last meeting with the Board of Trustees. He commented that Chancellor David K Scott had explained to both the President and the Board why the campus is feeling the effects of what would be a budget cut.

Scott himself was responding to Bulger's comments that the budget had only been cut when revenues are lower than they have been in previous years, and because they are not less, there is no crisis.

Avakian, also in attendance at the meeting, commented that he agreed with the decision not to use the financial cushion for the economic problems that the

Search continues for dean of Commonweath College

By Jake Lilien

Peter James Sederberg, the fifth and final candidate for the position of Dean of the Commonwealth College, spoke to a group of students and administrators in the Campus Center yesterday.

Sederberg, currently the Dean of the South Carolina Honors College [SCHC] at the University of South Carolina, began his lecture as all previous candidates have, discussing his academic background and personal achievements. He described the SCHC as "the best of both worlds," in that it, like the Commonwealth College, offers small classes within a large university setting.

"My position is that a public campus is supposed to serve the state. We have two options – we can either treat everyone the same, or we can treat everyone according to their needs."

"The basic idea is that we expect more from students, and thus we have to provide more from them," he said. "We wanted to improve public universities education in South Carolina. As it was, there was no reason for high-achieving students to stay in state. We had a vision of a living, learning requirement with a quasi-campus that was not set apart from the rest of the University."

He went on to say that the SCHS offers Learning Communities not unlike the ones set up by the Commonwealth College in Orchard Hill, although they are open to all students.

The first question of the session came from Sam Blasiak, a sophomore Economics major. He asked what steps Sederberg would take to raise money to recruit minority students into the Commonwealth College.

"We [in South Carolina] have just been hammered by the Federal Government," Sederberg said. "We have had to eliminate race-based scholarships. That was a major tool. We had an automatic scholarship given to African-American National Merit and National Achievement Finalists."

"We've had good news and bad news. The good news is that we have one of the highest percentages of African-American students of any university in the country. We also have one of the highest graduation rates of African-American students. I don't think the University has a whole lot to apologize for. The bad news is that in terms of getting them into the Honors College, our yields are terrible. Our major effort is to reach out to rising sophomores – it's a way for us to accept talented students that we missed earlier."

Student Trustee Seth Avakian asked Sederberg what achievement as Dean of the SCHC he was most proud of.

"I'm most proud of maintaining the contract that I've kept with the students," he said. "We promise students something, and that contract has been honored and built onto."

He added that the contract he was referring to dealt with academic quality.

"We have grown from 700 students in the Honors Program to 1,000, and the quality of the student body is better than it was before. The quality of academic opportunities is better."

In response to a question asking why he was seeking a new position, Sederberg stated that he was nearing the end of his term as Dean.

"I hope I have the courage to walk away in four years, when it's over," he said. "I would hate to be one of those people who has to be dragged away from their position. And I can't expect that in the fall of my final year I'll find a new position."

Avakian fielded another question, challenging Sederberg to explain the place of an honors college at a public university.

"I'm proud to go to a land-grant institution," Avakian said. "There's been a lot of criticism against the Commonwealth College, in that it goes against the idea of a land-grant institution."

"I'm going to give you my personal philosophy here," Sederberg replied. "My position is that a public campus is supposed to serve the state. We have two options – we can either treat everyone the same, or we can treat everyone according to their needs. I call the first one the institutional model. Everyone is a widget, and we hammer them out all the same. If the university is supposed to meet people's needs, it can not be a one-size-fits all institution."

CCSP plans for future

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The Campus Committee for Student Power (CCSP) had a lot on their agenda at last night's meeting: the continued work on a student bill of rights, solidified plans to become a state student association by next spring and a petition for funding to send representatives to a national conference for training next month.

Inspired by the former State Student Association of Massachusetts and also by such states as Oregon and Wisconsin that have housed successful state student associations, CCSP's aim is to put the power behind the student voice.

Last week CCSP held their first meeting, which attracted over 40 students from 28 different Registered Student Organizations and 13 Student Government Association (SGA) senators. During that meeting, they began to draft a student bill of rights and presented the work-in-progress bill of rights at this week's meeting.

Gabriel Tavares, SGA associate chief justice and CCSP member, said CCSP came up with ideals that they believe represent the overall student population, and that these ideals must be formulated into the bill of rights to serve as guidelines. He said, "[The bill of rights aims to] incorporate the students on campus now and the students who will come. It's not about us, it's about our school."

Tavares and BJ Cortis, CCSP member and MassPirg Chair, felt that the most important right was the access to education. Cortis said, "Higher education itself is a right."

Members at the meeting discussed how the CCSP could one day work with this right, and provided concerns regarding state funding for financial aid. Freshman Peter Zwahlen said, "I sold my soul to the government coming here."

Cortis hopes that all students value the right to establish a democratically elected student government and Lanell James, senator and CCSP member, explained that the group needs an institutional mechanism to reach the goal of a statewide association and that "the SGA is a mechanism, it's one of the tools we need to use."

Other rights included the freedom of speech, the right to due process before the law, the right to access to information as to all university affairs, and the right to participate in administrative decisions. Students brought up issues of privatization, budget allocations and the Commonwealth College.

Outing Club to challenge record

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

When it comes to holding the record time for canoeing a 368-mile course down the Connecticut River, taking almost 68 hours, the University of Massachusetts Outing Club holds the record. Starting today, they're going to try to beat that.

The race starts in Massachusetts and will take the crew of nearly 24 students through three other surrounding U.S. states and into Canada. President of the Outing Club Michelle Weber, a junior sociology and education major, said this is the third time the canoe crew has attempted to tackle a course that will take them through rough rapids and into the silent dark waters overnight.

The race is simply a race against time, Weber said. Not competing against any other colleges and pitted against Mother Nature, the team is hoping to break the record that, according to them, is held throughout New England.

The crew will be paddling in four canoes and six students will be assigned to each canoe as an individual team. They will rotate in three groups of two, paddling for six hours straight and then six hours of sleeping in a packed van and then six hours of paddling continuing for 68 hours straight.

"Each pair will average in five shifts [of six hours] about 150 miles for the entire weekend," Weber said.

To beat the current record of 68 hours, Weber estimates that they would have to average five miles per hour. She said she is confident they will be successful because the river is high and is flowing fast, allowing them to make good time.

Sie Moore, a junior electrical engineering major, is participating in the event for his first time. Moore, on exchange this semester from England, said "I ended up coming along and did some canoeing trip last semester and then this race came along and I heard about it very early on but didn't do much about it."

Moore said an opportunity to participate arose and he jumped at it.

"Then all of a sudden people were talking about it and I was on a reserve list," Moore said. "A couple weeks ago, Michelle asked me if I still wanted to go and now I'm canoeing."

Weber indicated that some members of the club dropped out of the race at the last minute and as a result, she said she might be forced to drop a team, leaving a total of only three boats.

Even so, they appear confident and Weber said that there is even a part of the race in which they will be racing during the night. She said in these instances the race

University now faces.

"I tend to agree with the Board of Trustees, this is not a case to use the financial cushion," he said. "I do not think that there is a pot of gold anywhere on this campus."

After much discussion a motion was also passed that was designed to allow greater communication between the Board of Trustees and the representative from the Faculty Senate at UMass.

O'Conner explained that the motion would allow for more issues to be raised and addressed during the meetings.

"It is getting hard, and even harder with the fewer meeting that thes [the Board of Trustees] have, to have a voice," he said.

Others in attendance at the meeting disagreed with the motion citing that the campus should wait before presenting the issue to the Board and the President.

Senator James Tate, speaking on behalf of the History Department explained that the University needs to deal with the issue of budget cuts on campus first, and then present the information to the Board of Trustees.

"We are dealing with budget issues on this campus, and we should focus on this campus," he said.

Making additional comments supporting the motion, O'Conner explained that the campus needed a voice that was readily heard at these meetings.

"We are always reacting to something," O'Conner explained. "We are constantly fighting for a small piece of the pie."

He also questioned the budget of the state commenting that the Registry of Motor Vehicles was allotted more funding than UMass.

"Where does education fit?" he questioned.

In the end the motion was passed with an 18 to two vote.

becomes dangerous because the visibility is lessened and the competitors wouldn't be able to see dangerous rocks or dams lying in their path.

"What we do have to worry about is dams, because there are places where we have to do what is called portage, where we actually have to pull the canoe out of the water and place it in a safe place," Weber said. "This canoe race is lots of fun though and great memories, but you will become absolutely exhausted and it will take every ounce of energy out of you."

Weber said no one has ever paddled it in less than three days. However, she said they start tonight at midnight and by midnight on Monday, they will be forced to pull out, regardless of where they are in the race, but hoping that by that time, they will be holding another record and will have another story to tell.

association, James outlined the importance of collaborating with schools that have already achieved this goal. Part of this will be accomplished by sending four student representatives to a state student association national conference in Minneapolis, Minn. from May 5 to 7.

The conference offers workshops on student voting, freedom of speech and most important to the CCSP is a workshop on state student association development and grassroots organization.

The meeting concluded with the signing of a "weighted" petition. The petition asks for $1,878 to fund the airfare, room and board of the four selected students and the CCSP plans to present the petition to the administration for approval.

The group has set a general timeline, hoping to make UMass part of a state student association, comprised of at least eight schools, by next spring. By next December, they hope, to align with UMass Dartmouth and UMass Lowell. However, for funding the CCSP is looking to place a $1.2 mandatory fee on each student's semester bill – an idea taken from the original State Student Association of Massachusetts that existed in the 1980s.

Workshops were held after the meeting on solidifying the timeline and coalition building on campus, both were open to all students.

UMass HIV/AIDS education rated amongst nation's best

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Department of Health Services (UHS) has been named among the nation's best at HIV/AIDS education and prevention, according to an April 5 press release.

The National Association of Student Personal Administrators (NASPA) ranked UHS in the top eight, according to a new report, the release said.

According to the NASPA report, the highest rated campuses all had common characteristics, including support from administration and programs that relate to the students.

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players, the Everywoman's Center, and the Stonewall Center were all mentioned as factors in the high rating.

According to the report, health services, academics, and housing are all included in the HIV/AIDS education program. UMass is also involved with the Five-College HIV-AIDS Committee, which is a sponsor of World AIDS Day events in the area.

"Collaboration with a broad range of groups is necessary for success," Pamela Gonyer, the director of health education and outreach at UMass, said.

"Rather than focus on program-specific components, our success is strengthened by addressing the issues and concerns associated directly with HIV and AIDS. That's why our efforts work," she said.

Pat Colivario, a Resident Assistant in the Orchard Hill residential area, called the HIV/AIDS training given to future R.A.'s as a part of their R.A. training "general" and "basic."

He felt that the trainers "don't want us to give false information," and added that the trainees were told where they could go to get more information on the subject.

"It's up to the individual whether or not to pursue additional training," he said. "We're not experts and we're not expected to know everything."

Bernette A. Melby, the director of health services said UMass' HIV/AIDS program had become an example nationwide because of the involvement of the entire campus.

"AIDS is a disease that touches everybody," she stated in the press release, "it's not just other people who are at risk."

"People may feel that they are immune, but we know they aren't," she said.

Elian not turned over

By Sue Anne Pressley and April Witt
The Washington Post

MIAMI – Helicopters buzzed overhead, drivers blasted car horns and grandmothers banged on pots and pans. Outside the modest white house in Little Havana, where Elian Gonzalez has spent the past 4 1/2 months and where, it was feared, federal marshals might come to get the boy, the crowd was uneasy Thursday and ever growing.

Paramedics worked to revive those who fainted from the sticky heat and intense emotion. Bands of people marched the surrounding streets, singing the Cuban national anthem. Prayer circles quietly formed in one area; chanters shouted "Libertad!" in another. Although it was largely well behaved, an air of defiance and anti-government fervor seemed to suffuse the crowd, as supporters waited on edge for the next step in the long-running and complicated showdown with federal officials.

"I will try to stop them," said retired waiter Jesus La Rosa. "Cubans respect the law, but we are like bees. We are very nice and make honey. But if you push the bee, we will sting. They are pushing us."

By late afternoon, the crowd swelled to thousands of people clogging the major intersections of this largely Cuban-American community and prompting police to reinforce barricades and enlarge a buffer zone around the house. Only a few of the officers wore flak jackets, and although they stood at attention, eyeing the crowd carefully, they did not seem overly worried – not yet. No violence or arrests were reported.

"Obviously, things have come to a head," said Lt. Bill Schwartz, a spokesman for the Miami police department. "If the federal government does come in, if that should happen, we can expect more passion in the crowd, but we are comfortable that we will be able to do crowd control."

A life-size effigy of Cuban President Fidel Castro swung from a light pole a half-block from the house. Overhead, a small plane flew back and forth, trailing a banner that said, in Spanish, "Elian, Miami and God Love You." Protesters craned to get a glimpse of the celebrities who came to have a say among them, singer Gloria Estefan and actor Andy Garcia, both Cuban.

Americans, who visited with Elian inside and exhorted the crowd outside to remain calm.

"We want no violence. We are a peaceful community," Estefan said, after Elian's Miami relatives had defied an Immigration and Naturalization Service order to surrender the boy to federal authorities at 2 p.m.

"We urge every Cuban American to join us in the effort."

At times, it seemed the protesters were attempting to answer that call. Norman del Valle, vice president of the anti-Castro Democracy Movement, said that the Latin Chamber of Commerce shortly after noon asked its member businesses to close their doors so that workers could pour out into the streets and swell the crowds.

Our Opinion

An Eye On Safety

If you are one of those students who hang on dearly to your right to privacy, you'd better get over it. You'd better get over it because if you live in Southwest, your privacy is going to be diminished to say the least.

Because of the recent fire set by two students in Southwest, Chancellor Scott has ordered that security cameras be placed throughout the living area, apparently to prevent isolated incidents such as this from ever happening again. But there are a few problems with this "solution."

The first problem is funding. Where is the money going to come from for these cameras? Are we as students going to be paying for them? Should we be? Should students from other living areas be responsible for the obnoxious actions of two Southwest students? How about other students from Southwest – should they be held culpable as well? The administration has many other more pressing issues to deal with before it handles "security" in Southwest.

We need more traffic lights in front of the Parking Services trailer, don't we? Of course we do. We also need to remodel the Old Chapel for the tenth consecutive year, and we also need to add more benches to the outside of the library. See where this is headed? The administration pays no attention at all to the pressing issues on this campus, like the Morrill Science Center falling apart, students being raped, and Adam Prentice being killed. Instead, our leaders attempt to make our school "appear" aesthetically pleasing and perfectly safe.

They try to make our campus look better in order to bring in more potential donations, so it's no surprise to see Scott attempt to place security cameras in the most densely populated area in Amherst, and one of the most densely populated areas in the world: Southwest. But besides money, another problem with this idea is its feasibility. Would cameras be effective at "catching people in the act?" Doubtful. Certainly cameras cannot see everyone and everything all the time, which brings up another issue with Scott's idea: where are the cameras going to be placed and how many of them will there be?

Will cameras be placed in dorm rooms so Scott and his administration can catch students in "every" act? Will there be cameras placed outside dorms so we can see every person that enters or exits the building? Maybe there will just be one large camera in the sky that watches everyone 24/7 and a secret alarm goes off whenever anyone commits a crime. Seem ridiculous? So does Scott's plan.

Over the years, Southwest has had the reputation of being the wildest and craziest living area on campus. While this article neither accepts nor rejects that proposal, one wonders why Scott didn't decide to place cameras in every living area. Did he honestly decide to discriminate against Southwest because of one isolated incident? The Collegian certainly hopes not. Although no one can tell how effective these cameras will be in deterring crime, one must question the right to privacy and the potential violation of that right these cameras will bring.

They can't inspect themselves

UMass clothing is probably made in sweatshops. The other day I took a stroll through the back of the University Store, and came across apparel made in Bangladesh, Honduras, China, Malaysia, Mexico, Pakistan, Taiwan, and Hong Kong.

Factories in these countries are notorious for paying workers one to 43 cents per hour. Workers are abused sexually, physically, and verbally, and the females are forced to take birth control pills; workers are threatened and blacklisted if they try to form unions, all while toiling in eight to 23-hour shifts.

The probability is high that the workers who make our school's clothing are employed under these conditions. But we cannot prove it. We can only find out for sure if our school joins a monitoring organization. Starting this week, a UMass committee will meet for the first time and discuss the idea of joining either the Fair Labor Association (FLA) or the Worker Rights Consortium (WRC). These are new international monitors that plan to inspect apparel factories and send back reports to their client universities.

Aaron Johnson

But only the WRC is to be trusted. The WRC was formed by students while the FLA came out of the White House and corporate board rooms. While the WRC assigns its "Sweat-Free" seal to clothing on a factory-by-factory basis, the FLA will call an entire company "Sweat-Free" even if it has only inspected a handful of its factories.

Furthermore, under the FLA plan, companies have a role in choosing which factories are monitored. They suggest a list of factories for the FLA to visit – and, in the FLA's own words, "There shall be a general presumption in favor of the Participant's suggested list." By contrast, the WRC proposes unannounced spot-check investigations to find out what conditions are like on a typical day.

The matter is particularly pressing because we already know that sweatshops exist in these countries. In China, apparel workers work 10 to 16-hour shifts, six to seven days a week; they live in dormitories behind barbed wire and sleep on wooden, triple-decker bunk beds. Ninety percent of the workers are adolescent women earning 23 cents per hour. Even though expenses are much lower in China, 23 cents is still not enough to live on. According to the Chinese workers, they need about 87 cents per hour in order to meet their families' basic necessities. This is called a "living wage," as it's based on the estimated amount needed to live on. It would hardly catapult them from rags to riches. But at least it would raise them out of extreme poverty.

We're not talking about big bucks. They're not asking for the $8.42 that American apparel workers make. Honduran garment workers make 43 cents per hour, yet they need only 79 cents to survive. Should this be so difficult for the companies to arrange?

Of course not. But the companies are not about to do it. Nike, which gets much of its clothing from China, recently broke its licensing agreement with Brown University rather than submit its factories to WRC inspections. It's a "matter of principles," said Simon I. Pestridge, head of Nike's labor-practices department.

Nike? Principles? "We don't have a seat at the table of the WRC," Pestridge said, "so it's a nonstarter for us. We don't agree with its founding principles."

Exactly. Unless the suspect corporations have full control over monitoring, they won't participate. Since Nike helped to form the FLA and exerts control over its board, only the FLA can inspect Nike factories. Does anyone else see a conflict of interest here? Sweatshop-abusing companies like Nike shouldn't be allowed to inspect themselves.

Conversely, Nike has no influence over the WRC. If the WRC inspected Nike factories, American consumers might just find out the grim reality that exists behind the locked doors of Nike-contracted sweatshops.

If companies will not allow an independent monitor inside its factories, then they must have something to hide. The news from Brown should reinforce the argument that the WRC is the only monitor we can trust. After all, if Nike is such a "principled" company, then what is it worried about?

These are some of the many reasons that the UMass committee should not even consider joining the FLA. The administration has wasted enough time waffling over the issue in putting together this committee, while another committee has been discussing sweatshops since September. They're called "UMass Students Against Sweatshops," and they are open to everyone.

This committee has been educating itself about sweatshops since the beginning of the year, but the administration has had no interest in coming to meetings or participating at all. Maybe it's against their "principles." Maybe they wanted full control over the decision-making process, sort of like Nike. Maybe that's why Vice Chancellor Paul Page hand-picked each person to sit on his own committee. Maybe that's why none of the dozen professors who wrote letters requesting seats on his committee were chosen.

Write to Paul Page, our Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance. Seven hundred UMassers already have. Say that you support the WRC and that our school MUST join this monitoring group by the end of the semester. Ask why he even allows the issue of the FLA to be on the table, when it is clear that the FLA should have no role in an honest, objective analysis of UMass apparel factories. Page's address is ppage@admin.umass.edu.

We do not want the companies to cut and run. They must stay and improve. The last thing we want is workers to lose their jobs, but we can only pressure companies through an effective monitor.

If you're interested in the "committee" founded by students and professors, call the UMass Students Against Sweatshops at 549-9994. Or come to the Cape Cod Lounge from 6 to 8 p.m. on Wednesdays, and learn more about the sweatshop industry and how the fastest-growing student movement since the 1950s is working to bring it down one campus at a time.

Notes From The Campus Center Basement

Well these are my notes, my bits of wisdom if that's even what you can call them. This is what the Collegian has taught me.

I have to admit, If I'd stayed in the Art Department instead of defecting to the Collegian and Communications major so I could create some kind of project every single day in our graphics department, I would be doomed to be a starving artist. Let's face it, if you can't make a portfolio from work 17,000 people or more see everyday, well, then you can't really make a portfolio. never mind for a hiring committee.

Well if this tells you anything about my life here, and sadly I'm not alone, I'm missing a class to do this. Not even a bad class, well ok it is about half the time, when the professor is lecturing instead of the fine movies I thought I was going to see...Kara's there, and so's Ryan and Teresa, poor souls. For the rest of the dedicated staff, good luck. I hope Sam and Smitty's clips and work ethic land them a job worthy of an A student, as well as everyone else's who made my life just that much easier. We've all learned classes aren't experience though. And that you're not supposed to be stuck with jobs like this until after school. And even our resident smarty pants like Adam and Dave get a thanks for the help and a best of luck, but they probably won't need luck and neither should the rest of us.

I thank my great graphics staff here for a few valuable lessons. One unfortunately was to never trust anyone with anything, and one was to let go. I'd have to say Sage and Sue, Joylyn and Ben get a 'what what' for teaching me that it's ok to let someone else do the work. Oh, and no thanks to the rest of you slackers.

Kara Stokes is the undisputed Photo Princess, the rest of you can deal. No really, you can.

Could somebody send me away to a foreign land so I don't have to hear about Elian Gonzalez?

The Janitorial staff has nothing to do with the state of the bathrooms on campus, the students' on campus messing them up out number them by far, oh and who chose the burnt sierra tiles?

I want to thank the Minuteman for the competition. The April fools issue was a joke. Get it? Isn't it funny that when you write about us negatively we don't care...and when we mentioned you the publication was supposed to be a joke instead of just being one. Thanks for the laughs. Tee Hee.

***

This paragraph is dedicated to SAM WILKINSON, and name recognition of course. He's hard-working, but a good doobie.

Props to those here who stood the test of time. We had a fine year, well at least as far as the second half goes. Oh, and sorry about the masthead.

If I made a movie of dorm life I'd have two stars, Stiffy T, as the fashionable Diamonds, and Beth D, as the greatest Jizz Mopper ever. Oh, the diamonds...

Heather is muy bueno, Ole! I never minded the music in the dorms, I'd have to say I think I'm a better person for it.

Thank goodness my fine Wednesday night staff.

I leaned that if you don't have an 'adult' to advise you'll do just fine filling in, well except for the gallstones thing.

Yeah Deb and Kathleen, you just wait until Haigis.

Where, oh where could my Underdog be?

Have a good time, that's the important thing.

I'm done.

Your Opinion

Chamber Choir Ignored

To the editor,

I was shocked after reading Virginia Avedisian's article covering the UMass Distinguished Alumni Awards ceremony which took place at the State House in Boston on April 11. As Ms. Avedistian did a wonderful job listing the award recipients, she failed to mention something that was an integral part of the ceremony: the participation of the UMass Chamber Choir.

The Chamber Choir was invited to sing and essentially represent the entire student body of this university, having been the only student group there. This is not the first time we have traveled to Boston to perform for President Bulger and take part in various events, nor is it the first time that the Collegian has totally overlooked our presence and importance in its coverage of these events.

Considering the particularly turbulent year that we have been through here at the Amherst campus, it is that much more important for people to be aware of all the positive things that go on here. The Chamber Choir's presence at these events allows people to see a different side of UMass than they might normally be exposed to. It allows them to see the dedication, hard work and talent that is so prevalent on this campus, that gets pushed aside in the news when crime rates and assault statistics are being reported. I am disappointed that the Collegian has blatantly and continuously ignored our participation in these events, and what participation could mean to the way we are perceived in the eyes of our own community and in the public realm.

There are only three and a half weeks of classes left. If you have something to say you better hurry up and write something. Bring down your column on disk and on paper, and leave them in the Ed/Op mailbox in the Collegian office. Both the disk and the paper copy should have your name and phone number written on them; we do not print anonymous submissions. Columns should be between 800 and 1,000 words. If you have any questions, call the office and ask for Gary, Alexis or Rob.

A secret desires party

"It's a secret desires party and you are definitely invited!" This is what it said at the top of the pink and purple colored party invitation my sister received in the mail weeks ago. She had received it from an old acquaintance with whom she had graduated from high school. This twice-folded piece of paper was inviting my sister to a home demonstration of adult novelties. That's right. I wrote adult novelties. I knew they had home demonstrations for Tupperware, health products, make up, and other products but now they have them for sex toys as well? It makes one curious what exactly the demonstration consists of...

Jason Czernich

My sister and I were both surprised that her old high school acquaintance would send out invites for this type of gathering. We didn't even know that there were home demonstration parties for sex toys. My sister did not attend this party or even RSVP. Instead she just laughed and put the invitation aside.

She did recommend I write one of my columns on this, and I thought that this was an excellent idea. Writing a column about this bizarre topic was too good to pass up. At least I thought it was bizarre. Can you imagine women like your grandmother or favorite aunt, along with a room of their best friends, marveling over the effectiveness of a ball gag or passing out samples of edible underwear?

When a co-worker, Masha, inquired about the subject of my next column I explained about the invitation my sister had received in the mail. Pretty soon another co-worker, Katie, was also listening to me explain about how my sister had a chance to experience an adult novelty party. A third co-worker of mine, Josh, then happened upon our conversation. Josh was very curious as to why I found the invitation unusual. I told Josh that I had heard of adult novelties and home demonstrations, but never before had I heard of home demonstrations for adult novelties in my entire life. Josh told me that he didn't find it unusual at all, and that he found it unusual that I found it unusual! I replied that I found it unusual, that he found it unusual, that I found it unusual. Josh replied that he found it unusual – okay never mind that part, it went on for hours...

We argued this point for a bit, and he believed that home demonstrations for adult novelties were not unusual and that I could be living a sheltered life because I was thinking so. I argued that there are some people out there who don't find sex toy demonstration parties unusual, but it is not something you see everyday, so there must be a lot of people who think they are unusual. Josh still thought I was wrong and I still think that I'm right. Neither of us had any tangible evidence, though.

Josh stated that I should survey people and get many more opinions on this. But how can I go about taking a survey on a subject this without offending some people? Could I wait outside the porno shop on Route 9 and survey people on this as they go in and out of the store? Could I approach them on the Campus Center concourse with my inquiries and risk sexual harassment charges? I guess phone calls would be a bad idea as well. So how do I go about this survey without making people feel uncomfortable? Easy: reader response.

The questions I'm looking to answers for are: Do you think adult novelty demonstrations are unusual? Do you think we censor too much in this society? Are we becoming prudes? Are we becoming perverts? I am very interested in what you have to say on this subject. My email address is jczernich@hotmail.com. Serious replies only, please. What are your feelings on the subject? This is not a joke. I seriously want to know.

Artist strives to bring passion to icons, yet honor tradition

By Bill Broadway
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Alexander Sokolov is working to change the face of Russian iconography, subtly but perceptibly.

The fall of the Soviet regime a decade ago has brought renewed interest in worship in his country, he said. But many people entering an Orthodox church for the first time are disappointed, not awed, when they look into the blank-eyed, flattened faces on the walls, ceilings and floors.

Instead of discovering a mystical pathway to God, they see "formal painting without soul, decoration without feeling," said the artist, in town for a brief exhibition of his work at the Russian Cultural Centre in Washington.

Sokolov, 40, is part of a new generation of Moscow-based iconographers. Twenty years ago, when the painting of icons was still prohibited by the Communist government, there were "very few" masters of the Byzantine style, he said. Today, there are "at least 10 good icon painters" and numerous others studying and practicing the art.

Despite this revival of interest, many contemporary Russians do not understand or identify with icons even when they make an effort to do so, Sokolov said.

The problem is not with the medium itself, a centuries-old art form that depicts saints and biblical events, but with the "main rule" of Christian iconography: A painter "is not to put his own passions into his work."

Sokolov has accepted commissions to paint individual icons or murals or to piece together ceramic-tile mosaics at churches and monasteries in Russia, Poland, the United States and Japan. In most cases, as required by the "very conservative" Orthodox hierarchy, he has followed the common practice of copying existing icons by previous masters.

Mere copying has no soul. "It's not my song," he said.

Sokolov believes iconography can "evolve" without radically altering the genre. The artist would not depict the Apostles in modern attire, for example, or stray from such traditional materials as gold leafing, silver gilt and solid wood "canvases." He tries to use "innovations . . . to underline the spiritual content of the character I'm doing."

In "Savior, Not Made by Hands," one of 13 icons on display at the center, Sokolov said, he focused on the eyes to capture the "quiet, deep emotion" behind Jesus' kindness and humanity. Modern believers see God "more like a (compassionate) father than a monster or judge," as often depicted in traditional icons, he said.

In a subtle variation on traditional technique, he framed the face with three gems – two emeralds and a tourmaline – using tiny nails to attach them to the surface of the limewood backing. Stones and gems are common in iconography, but most often appear in the background.

Sokolov framed "Mother of God, Korsunskaya," an image of Mary cheek-to-cheek with the baby Jesus, with a border of silk cloth he bought on a recent trip to India. For a portrayal of "Apostles Peter and Paul," he used a Greek-inspired image of the early church leaders embracing each other in a symbolic link of Western and Eastern Christianity.

Sokolov, whose works at this exhibit are priced from $650 to $2,700, makes his living as a religious and secular painter. But he hopes his religious art will give people a means of perceiving the divine.

"I want crowds of people to see the beauty of Heaven through my icons," he said. "I want them not to bring their troubles and problems into the church, for them to come to church not to ask but to come to say thank you and share and give."

His most famous icon, "Inexhaustible Cup," has attracted great crowds during the past five years because of stories about its power to heal brain cancer and help people overcome alcoholism.

The icon, located in the rebuilt Vysotsky Monastery in Serpukhov, a town 60 miles south of Moscow, shows Mary with uplifted hands and Jesus rising from a chalice on a table in front of her.

Sokolov re-created the icon based on a written description of the original, a 14th-century icon destroyed with the monastery in 1926 by the Red Army. Covered with intricate silver work, sapphires and other gems, the work has "a practical and a theological meaning."

That, ultimately, is what iconography is all about, he said.

Representin' Us

No habla espanol (I don't speak Spanish). Casa (house). Jamie (that's me, saying my name in Spanish). Me culo es del fuego (My ass is on fire). That's the extent of my Spanish. How I learned that last phrase is a completely different story, for a different column. Thank goodness I wasn't expected to be fluent in Spanish when I attended Puerto Rican Culture Night (no sarcasm intended).

I thought it was a well organized and great culture night and the club should be commended for it. Aside from being completely clueless during the Spanish portions of the program I was incredibly disappointed at student attendance. There was a great turnout of Spanish speaking students, however there didn't seem to be a significant amount of other students.

If you randomly ask students on campus why they picked UMass most of them will probably tell you that diversity was a deciding factor. They might continue to tell you that by being a part of a diverse campus they can learn about other cultures and learn new viewpoints. So how are students taking advantage of the diversity on this campus? Probably by popping a lenifer Lopez CD into their Discman and ordering from the local Chinese food restaurant. I've seen posters up all year for various culture nights and cultural performances happening on campus. I've attended two or three of these events and have come to the conclusion that the majority of the people that are attending these events are either part of the club putting on the culture night or are students of that particular ethnicity. It seems as if the ALANA students are the only people benefiting from these events because they are becoming increasingly culturally aware of their own ethnicity.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not shaking my finger at the Caucasian population on campus. If "Riverdance" came to UMass, I couldn't guarantee a large number of ALANA students to attend. Another observation I made was that ALANA students don't seem to be attending each other's events. Cultural pride is important, however education about other ethnicities is just as essential. ALANA students need to support each other; it's time to put aside your ethnic pride for a moment and see what others are doing, for a change. The opportunity for becoming more culturally enriched about other ethnicities is available on this campus and that as students we should take full advantage of this, while we still can. By not taking part in these programs being offered, students are missing out on the opportunity to have a fun and exciting educational experience beyond the classroom. Learning about other cultures gives you a sense of awareness about others and pushes you to take pride in your own ethnicity. It's time to "represent" by showing up to these events, so think twice next time you walk by that cultural night poster in the Campus Center concourse. You might be missing out on something good.

Tug of war: the complicated case of Elian Gonzalez

By Fern Shen
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON Elian Gonzalez's father came to the United States last week to get his son. It was the latest episode in the four-month saga of the Cuban boy. What would normally have been a private family matter has become an international tug of war over the 6-year-old. Relatives in Florida want Elian to stay in America. His father, who is now in Washington, wants to take him home to Cuba.

How did Elian become the world's most famous 6-year-old?

The short answer is: a shipwreck. The Cuban government does not allow people to leave without permission. Elian, his mother and 11 other Cubans had been trying to leave Cardenas, Cuba, and reach Florida by boat. Their boat sank on Nov. 22. Elian's mother and most of the others died. Two days later, on Thanksgiving Day, fishermen found Elian floating alone in an inner tube.

What has happened since he was rescued?

Elian has been living in Miami in the care of his great-uncle and cousins, who fled Cuba 30 years ago. Meanwhile, adults and officials are fighting over where he should live. His father, who was divorced from Elian's mother and lives in Cuba, wants his son to come back and be with him. His great-uncle and other Miami relatives, whom Elian hardly knew before, want him to stay with them.

Why are others arguing about Elian?

Elian's story means a lot to some Cuban-Americans, who left the island in the 1950s and 1960s. Many fled after the 1959 revolution, when the current leader, Fidel Castro, took over. These people dislike Castro's Communist government and say Elian's mother meant him to live in the United States, where there is more political freedom and economic opportunity.

But Elian's father, the Cuban government and the U.S. government say Elian should go back with his father, that it's more important for a child to be with his parent than to be in a country with any particular style of government. Under U.S. immigration law and international law, they say, Elian should be sent back.

What are the latest developments?

This week, the United States government will tell Elian's Miami relatives when he must be returned to his father. The relatives met with people working with the U.S. government to talk about the best and least painful way for Elian to move from his relatives to his father. But the meeting was cut short after Elian's great-uncle, Lazaro Gonzalez, insisted that he would not cooperate in turning over the boy, saying Elian does not want to return to Cuba and would be traumatized by abrupt removal from his Miami home.

U.S. government officials said that Elian's father, who has been staying for the past few days with a Cuban official in Bethesda, Md., has said he will remain in the United States with his son until the relatives make one last argument before a judge later this spring.

What does Elian want?

We really don't know. Elian told a reporter that he does not want to return to Cuba with his father. But people wonder if he was coached by someone to say that. Some adults say that the small boy, who has been through so much, may not be able to make up his own mind right now.

Court rejects Hitler biographer

By Marjorie Miller
Los Angeles Times

LONDON – Britain's High Court called Hitler biographer David Irving "anti-Semitic and racist" in a scathing ruling Tuesday that rejected the libel charges he had brought over claims he is a Holocaust denier.

Irving had sued U.S. professor Deborah Lipstadt and her British publisher, Penguin UK, for portraying him as someone who falsifies history to suit his widely dismissed views on Adolf Hitler and the Holocaust – including the assertion that there were no gas chambers at Auschwitz.

The British historian claimed that Lipstadt's book "Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory" distorted the truth and damaged his reputation.

High Court Judge Charles Gray said Irving not only had denied the Holocaust but is "a right-wing, pro-Nazi polemicist" who mixes with neo-fascists.

"Irving has for his own ideological reasons persistently and deliberately misrepresented and manipulated historical evidence," the judge said after reading for more than two hours from his 334-page decision.

Irving, who represented himself in the case and was pelted with eggs by protesters on the way into the courtroom, called the ruling "perverse." He boasted that the trial "undoubtedly has made me one of the best-known historians in the world."

But the ruling was an overwhelming moral victory for the defense, and particularly so given Britain's tough libel laws.

In the United States, Irving would have been treated as a public figure and would have had to prove that Lipstadt and Penguin had maligned him with malicious intent. In Britain, it was up to the defense to prove that their charges against Irving were true.

The defense brought in some of the top World War II experts to prove not that the Holocaust took place – that was a given in their case – but that Irving had willfully distorted facts. The judge concurred with the vast majority of the 19 cases they presented in detail during the three-month trial.

"He hoisted him on his own petard," said Lipstadt, professor of modern Jewish and Holocaust studies at Emory University in Atlanta. "We tracked his footnotes and followed his sources."

Jewish leaders hailed the verdict as a significant defeat for hate and prejudice.

"It is important to show again and again that we will not forget what happened in the Holocaust," Dror Zeigerman, the Israeli ambassador to Britain, said outside of the courtroom.

The Israeli government had released the 1,300-page prison memoirs of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann for use by Lipstadt's legal team in the case.

The Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center said the trial had exposed Irving as "a leading apologist for those who seek to whitewash the most heinous crime in human history."

In Los Angeles, where Lipstadt, a former University of California, Los Angeles professor, lived for many years, local Jewish leaders hailed the court's decision. "The ruling vindicates the scholarship of a true historian while reaffirming David Irving's status as a falsifier of history and a Nazi sympathizer," said David A. Lehrer, regional director of the Anti-Defamation League.

Irving argued in his career and in court that Hitler did not mastermind the execution of Jews during World War II but that the Final Solution was orchestrated by his associate Heinrich Himmler. He calls Auschwitz a "tourist attraction" built by the Poles after the war, and he asserts it was logistically impossible for the Nazis to have killed millions of people.

Mainstream historians accept the estimates that about a million people were gassed to death at Auschwitz-Birkenau alone.

The judge acknowledged that Irving is an expert in World War II military history, and he stressed that it wasn't his function to try to determine what actually happened during the Holocaust. He nonetheless concluded that the defendants were justified in asserting that Irving had misrepresented Hitler's views on Jews to try to exonerate the Nazi leader.

"He has done so in some instances by misinterpreting and mistranslating documents and in other instances by omitting documents or parts of them," Gray said. The result is a picture of Hitler "at odds with the evidence."

While acknowledging that historians make errors, the judge rejected Irving's claim that his mistakes were innocent. Gray said they consistently presented Hitler in "an unwarrantedly favorable light."

Gray said Irving did not have grounds for appeal but told him that he could contest that determination. He warned Irving that he would have to pay the bulk of the defense's legal fees, estimated by Penguin at more than $3 million.

Irving insisted that the ruling was full of factual errors and that he would have no difficulty winning an appeal.

Lipstadt responded that Irving was a "judge denier."

She said she felt vindicated after a battle that had taken five years of her life, and she grew tearful in recounting the thanks she has received from survivors of the Holocaust.

"There is a finite amount of time for them to be here to tell their story in the first person," Lipstadt said. When they are gone, "it will be easier to deny. That is why I wrote the book."

HASA makes mark on campus

By Brian Lohnes
Collegian Staff

The Haitian American Student Alliance is looking forward to another semester of growth in its membership. Patrice Bernadel, a public relations officer with the group expressed optimism and gave advice for potential members.

The Haitian American Student Association was established in 1984 with the intent to provide cultural, educational, and social enrichment to the University. "We want to inform the Haitian community about Haiti and help people who have become disconnected", Bernadel said. He also expressed the fact that the group primarily wanted to promote the Haitian culture. "We want to make people on campus aware of other cultures, we provide academic support and help out new students" he added.

Currently the group has a membership of between forty and fifty students. Bernadel also said that membership is open to all people on campus and is not exclusive to Haitians. "Anyone who wants to come out and give support is welcome."

Recently the group held its annual Haitian night. "It is basically a benefit for the children of Haiti. We had a guest speaker and many student performances." One of the groups that performed that evening was the club's dance team Neg et Negress. Comprised of twenty members Haitian and non-Haitian the group performs regularly and in various locations. They have performed at the Sirand Theater in Boston and as close by as Amherst College.

Club Members do actively travel back to Haiti. "We have some members who go back to Haiti regularly during the summer, either with their families or doing volunteer work", Bernadel said. He added, "Over the summer there is a volunteer program where students can go to Haiti and help them build houses."

When asked what advice he would give to people who are hesitating about joining the club, Bernadel said, "Just come out and see, it's like a big family; once you get sucked in you just can't go without it." He went on to say, "We have never had any problems, no one ever gets excluded, we promote fun and you will make friends for life. It's a great bonding experience."

Amherst College and Mt. Holyoke also have Caribbean groups on campus that are similar to the club here. Bernadel stressed the need for students to get involved, not just in the Haitian Student Association, but all across campus. "More people need to get involved across campus, especially younger students, because a lot of the older students are graduating." He was happy with the number of freshman and sophomore students who were involved with the club, but he was hopeful to get more involved. "The older kids are more involved in the club, eventually the younger kids will have to keep it going, so the main goal of this semester is to get more younger people involved."

Opportunity for UMass student to go to Australia

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Most students spend their college life dealing with the hustle and bustle of classes and residence hall living. An enormously high percentage of University graduates look back on their post-high school years as another four year stepping stone towards the work force. However, there some students get the opportunity to do something much better. All it takes is a little bit of creativity, planning and desire to go somewhere extravagant, and you will be reaping the benefits that the foreign exchange program has to offer.

Studying abroad can be a tremendous experience. I recently had the great fortune to sit down and talk to a student who spent a fair amount of time in Australia. Elizabeth Lopez, an HRTA major took a semester off to study at the Australia International Hotel School in Canberra, Australia last spring. Her experience was something that she will cherish forever and never forget.

Elizabeth spent four months in Australia in what would be the spring in the United States, but is actually the fall down under. She said that the weather was nice and the scenery was beyond beautiful. In order to actually study in Australia, Elizabeth needed to go through the program that was offered at Cornell University. One of the major advantages of attending UMass is that they can accommodate students to programs that they are not specifically working with. Even though there was no transfer to Australia from UMass at the time, the Foreign Exchange Office made special arrangements to make sure that Elizabeth was happy. They worked with Cornell and sent Elizabeth to the place that she truly wanted to be.

The minor questions that she had about the trip when she left, which included financial wonders and living concerns. The questions were more than answered when she arrived to the continent and discovered that there were a variety of opportunities for almost anything. She said that there were very cheap backpacking deals, as well as job opportunities.

Though she did not seek employment herself, she mentioned that some of the people she traveled with found jobs at restaurants or bars.

According to Elizabeth, school was an excellent experience. She took fifteen credits, some of them being from an internship that allowed her to get the full experience of life in Australia.

The Foreign Exchange office offers opportunities for all UMass students to travel to hundreds of countries around the globe. Check out the possibilities in room 467 of Hills South.

Creed will turn the Mullins Center into their own prison on Saturday night. Along with Sevendust, the show should prove to be spectacular.

Creed: "Are You Ready?"

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

For the third week in a row, a sold out crowd will pile into the Mullins Center on Saturday night. This time that band that will ignite the crowd will be the Orlando based rock group Creed.

Coming off of the release of Human Clay, their second studio album, last fall, Creed is being hailed as one of the top alternative rock and roll acts in the country. It is apparent that no new rock act has had the immediate success over the past three years that Creed has been so fortunate to encounter.

The quartet Creed is made up of lead singer Scott Stapp, guitarist Mark Tremonti, bassist Brian Marshall and drummer Scott Phillips. The band may be the most popular music act to come from the state of Florida that has come around and proclaim that they "want it this way." With some very strong influences from acts such as The Doors, Metallica and Pearl Jam, Creed has been able to fight off the accusations of dullness and unoriginality with proof from the incredibly huge following that they have gained. In an interview with Wind-Up Records, members of Creed say that they challenge their listeners to think without preaching or pretending to have all the answers."

In 1997 the band released their first album, My Own Prison on Wind-Up records on a budget less than modest. To say that the album was successful would be a glaring understatement. The first single off of the album, "My Own Prison" was an instant success, and the other three singles, "Torn," "One," and "What's this Life For?" all became staple songs for modern rock radio. Since then, the album has sold millions of copies. My Own Prison was also the first ever rock debut to have four number one singles on Rock Radio.

Less than two years later Creed made the attempt to live up to hype that surrounded My Own Prison with their sophomore release, Human Clay. Once again to only say that they lived up to the hype would be a severe understatement. After two radio number one singles on the radio, the album is showing no signs of stopping, and was last ranked at number seventeen despite being released over twenty-seven weeks ago. The album debuted at number one on the Billboard chart.

Even though the band has had to adjust with the amount of success that they've stumbled upon so quickly, they do not seem to be backing down to the challenge of keeping up the momentum. Ever since the release of the second album they have made a commitment to continue touring and keep giving the fans what they want. This Saturday night they will bring their tremendous tour to the Mullins Center.

Along with Creed will be two opening bands. The first will be a relatively unheard of new band, UPO, and the other will be the tremendous hardcore rockers from Atlanta, Sevendust. Sevendust will be opening the show in support of their new album, Home. The album was released in 1999 on TVT records.

Creed's sold out concert with UPO and Sevendust will begin at 7:30pm at the Mullins Center. The show will prove to be wonderful, and if you are fortunate enough to have tickets, Creed asks on the first song from Human Clay, "Are you ready for what's to come?"

After a long fight with indignities; Dutton finds resolution in his life

By Paul Farhi
The Washington Post

Spring rolls off the green-breasted acres of Charles S. Dutton's farm. Out back, in a paddock, horses canter. We're 17 miles from Baltimore, 17 miles from where Dutton grew up, mean and felonious. He's been gone 20 years. He doesn't like going back.

Baltimore is where Dutton's brother, a heroin addict for 25 of his 44 years, died in 1993 of complications from AIDS. Is where his sister, a one-time petty thief and recovering cocaine addict, still lives. It's where the young "Roc" Dutton before he went from jail to Yale, before he became a Broadway and Hollywood actor stabbed a man to death.

He goes back reluctantly to visit his mother and sister. "It's changed so much," he says. "All my buddies are dead, in the pen or strung out." Dead, in the pen or strung out.

He says this matter-of-factly. In the course of an afternoon, he'll say it several times more.

He went home last August, but it was a job. For three months he commuted from his little farm to the city to direct "The Corner," a six-part miniseries beginning Sunday on HBO, based on David Simon and Edward Burns' 1997 nonfiction account of a year in the life of a drug-blasted neighborhood.

It's a grave piece of work, on which HBO lavished a $15 million budget and has provided a prestige time slot (following "The Sopranos" for six consecutive weeks).

"The Corner" tracks 15-year-old DeAndre McCullough (Sean Nelson) and his addict parents, Fran Boyd (Khandi Alexander) and Gary McCullough (T.K. Carter), as their lives become a slow-motion landslide. Dutton unsentimentally captures the book's undulating waves of bleakness, delusion and degradation from a script by Simon, a former Baltimore Sun reporter, and David Mills, a former Washington Post writer.

Filmed amid the treeless row-house Baltimore moonscape, "The Corner" is familiar territory to Dutton. Most of the series was shot about a mile from the housing project, hard by the Maryland State Penitentiary, where he grew up. The locals still remember him, not as a face from movies (Menace II Society, A Time to Kill) or his self-titled TV series, "Roc," but as one of their own.

The making of "The Corner" was art imitating life, and life imperiling art. The filming bumped the dealers off their usual corners, causing a potentially lethal competition among rivals that Dutton and Simon had to smooth over. (At one point, Simon apologized to the dealers for the disruption.)

Meanwhile, ghosts kept appearing from Dutton's past. A woman whom he had mentored when she was a child in a literacy program he started came by the set; she'd become a crack-addicted prostitute. Two of the 12 men who'd been with Dutton in a prison drama company 25 years earlier wandered over. The rest: dead, in the pen or strung out.

A young local guy, whom Dutton cast to play a drug dealer who stabs a customer, was himself stabbed to death on the streets a month after filming was completed.

"This became personal for me," Dutton says. "Because of my life and my past, I was always equated with some kind of expert on this subject. Which I very well might be."

He chuckles. He's 49, built like a vintage Volkswagen, with a double-wide neck and a bullet head. He's on the short side, but his powerful body and deep voice make him seem bigger, more formidable, even as he sinks into his living room couch wearing gold corduroy slippers.

Like "The Corner's" principal subjects, Roc Dutton took drugs: cocaine, LSD, marijuana, opium, hashish, heroin. But never, he says, was he a drug addict. Dutton had a bigger appetite for violence. His nickname, from childhood rock fights, stuck when he became an amateur boxer.

Later, he graduated to bare knuckles, knives, handguns. "I enjoyed knocking the (expletive) out of people," he says merrily. "I wasn't a bully. I would have been dead if I had been. But I enjoyed violence."

Dutton's parents divorced when he was 4. He was raised by his mother, who cleaned houses and refused to accept welfare to feed her three children. That pride may account for Dutton's conservative contempt for what he refers to as "damn government programs."

He ran with an older crowd, got into minor scraps, dropped out of seventh grade and landed in reform school. In 1967, at 16, he got into a street fight with a man in his twenties. He stabbed the man repeatedly. The man bled to death, and Dutton was sentenced to five years at the state prison in Jessup for manslaughter.

Today he reflects: "I killed a guy who nearly killed me. I never did anything to anyone who wouldn't have done the same to me.

At first, I had no remorse. But then I used to wonder what the guy would look like if he was still living. Would he amount to something? Knowing what he was like then, I know now."

Dutton served 20 months, but not long after being released he was arrested again, on robbery and weapons charges. This time he got a three-year sentence in the Maryland state pen, the institution that stood outside his old bedroom window.

One day a guard kept him from seeing a visitor. Enraged, Dutton challenged him to a fistfight. As Dutton describes it, they had "a wonderful, nice 10 minutes busting each other up" in a locked room. Dutton figured it was a fair fight. But the guard eventually pressed charges ("he was pressured to do so," Dutton claims). The conviction earned Dutton eight more years in prison.

He is bitterly amused by this: "I got a five-year sentence for killing a black man; I got eight years for hitting a white man."

Later on, following a cellblock beef over which TV program to watch, a fellow con stabbed Dutton in the neck with an ice pick. The blade plunged into his lungs, collapsing one of them.

He nearly bled to death.

It only stoked his rage. He'd become a fire-breathing radical, a Black Panther who read Mao, Marx and Malcolm X and "believed wholeheartedly in the armed overthrow of the U.S. government." But he believes now that this was his initial salvation. Without "absolute defiance," he says, he might have been a jailhouse suicide.

When he refused to accept an assignment cleaning toilets, he was banished to isolation for three days. There, in a dim 5-by-7-foot cell, Dutton read a book of plays he'd found in the prison library. He was transfixed, and ultimately transformed.

Dutton got his cellblock pals together and talked them into forming a drama troupe. The power of the stage the ability to make even convicted criminals laugh, applaud or sit rapt changed him. He decided then, he said, "to rediscover my humanity."

When he was paroled in 1976, after serving 7 1/2 years, he renounced the streets. He had earned his high school equivalency certificate and a two-year college associate's degree in prison, and entered Towson (Md.) State University. He earned a degree and began landing roles with the Baltimore Theatre Company, among others. Then he applied to and was accepted into Yale Drama School.

At Yale, he met the two most important people of his professional life, director Lloyd Richards and playwright August Wilson. Richards drafted him for roles in the Yale Repertory Theater. Wilson selected him for his Broadway debut, in Wilson's "Ma Rainey's Black Bottom." Dutton won a Tony Award nomination, as he did later for his role in Wilson's Pulitzer Prize-winning play "The Piano Lesson."

Roc Dutton was on his way, up and out of Baltimore.

Initially, Dutton resisted the offer to direct "The Corner."

Then he read the script by Simon and Mills, which he felt bestowed some humanity on the struggles of drug addicts and asked "larger questions."

HBO "wanted to do something in an election year to ask the government what we're finally going to do" about the drug problem, Dutton said. "At that point, it ignited my politics."

"I knew his history," said Simon, "The Corner's" co-author and co-executive producer. "I knew a lot of what we'd be explaining was going to be second nature for someone from East Baltimore who'd been through what he's been through. And I knew he could pull performances out of a young cast. This is an actor's actor."

Dutton says he told the actors to "play the person, not the drugs." The finished piece is almost journalistic in its depiction, capturing the sociology friendships, betrayals, odd loyalties _ of the desperately poor and sick. The air of verisimilitude is enhanced by "interviews" with the principal characters that Dutton, off camera, conducts at the beginning and end of each hour.

Dutton also captured the low buzz of madness that is soaked through the book, the forbidding sense of looming disaster. There are copious, graphic scenes of dope shooting, beatings, a stabbing, a running gun battle.

It's neither pretty nor commercial.

"This is a story about people whom no one wants to think about anymore _ petty criminals, drug addicts, the poorest of the poor," acknowledges Mills. "Yet we think we made a show that people haven't seen before, from a perspective that you don't see on television."

Once a leftist revolutionary, Dutton is now part racial ideologue and part conservative.

"In these communities, you almost have to give up and throw away the 16-year-olds and the 25-year-olds to save the 4-year-olds," he says. "The 25-year-old is serving life without parole. The 16-year-old is on his way to serving life. The 4-year-old is sitting on the steps, becoming immunized against the violence and accepting that as his lot in life. So you have to throw away two generations to save one.

"Newt Gingrich said we ought to put those kids in orphanages. I agree with that man wholeheartedly!"

The current condition of the inner city, he believes, is ultimately the legacy of slavery and racism. "The word for it is simply genocide," he says. "Short of legalizing heroin and cocaine for documented addicts and taking the profit motive out of it, I don't see Americans doing anything about it."

"Look," he says, "if I once owned you, regardless of the centuries that have passed, if I once owned you, how could I ever feel in a million years that you are my equal?"

"The problems in this country are a direct residue of slavery," he says. "It was the worst atrocity of modern mankind, and in that I include the Holocaust, which was an isolated six-year incident. The residue runs through the veins of a lot of Americans."

Don't African Americans bear responsibility, too?

Dutton laughs. "If that two-thirds of blacks who are middle-class could get their act together, you'd never have to ask white people, the government, for a single goddamn dime," he says. "I don't think it's the responsibility of white people to do anything.

We don't get anywhere still expecting something from the government. If (African Americans) spend $300 billion a year, we have no excuse why we can't solve our own problems, financially and socially."

So wipe out programs to aid the poor? Yes. "We need the Republicans, the Senate, the Congress, the president, to say all this program (expletive) is over with. Maybe that's the shock black people need."

Dutton figures this isn't going to get him elected to anything, but then, "I'm an artist," he points out, "not a politician."

Charles Dutton, seen here in his 1999 film Random Hearts, has overcome a lot to establish himself as a top notch actor.

Don't put on your tights to Rumble

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Staff

Ready to Rumble
Directed by Brian Robbins
With David Arquette, Scott Caan, Oliver Platt, and Rose McGowan
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

Does anyone really want to see another film directed by Brian Robbins, the actor-cum-director who was most famous as Eric, the punk from the old TV show Head of the Class? He directed last year's "let's give out another movie role to an actor form Dawson's Creek" Varsity Blues. The only saving grace from that movie was the ever-present MTV soundtrack, and the chick-magnet status of James van der Beek. So, I ask you again, moviegoer, do you really think a film like Ready to Rumble is anything to write texcuse the blatant pun) home about?

Scott Caan (whose relation to a far superior actor - James Caan - is in question) is an actor whom I am growing to dislike every time I see him on screen. He was funny as Tweeter in Varsity Blues, but he took a turn for the worse in his choice of roles since then. He played a Special Agent in Enemy of the State, and a Wall Street-esque thug in Boiler Room. He is constantly getting upstaged by his co-stars in every role he chooses. The same goes here with his co-star David Arquette.

David Arquette is "on-point" as Deputy Dewey in the Scream trilogy, and incredibly "not-on-point" as every other character he plays. He even plays his TV commerical (1-800-Call-ATT) character pretty lame (why is he always acting like he's just been injected with high amounts of caffeine and nicotine?) If one wants to see a decent wrestling film about WWF or WCW (or as I like to call them "Wicked Wicked Fake" and "Way Crappy White trash"), then a documentary like Beyond the Mat is a good choice.

The plot synopsis for this film is a simple one (and one that I'm not really going to go too in-depth upon). Two bumbling idiots who work for the sanitation department try to resuscitate the career of their favorite wrestler, and playing against type is the ever-affable Oliver Platt. Now, I don't know if you have ever seen the abomination of a film that is Lake Placid, but Oliver Platt plays an overweight alligator aficionado who looks horrible in a wet suit. He looks equally horrible dressed as a pseudo-wrestler here.

Rose McGowan (who, I might add, is engaged to Marylin Manson) plays a dancer about whom David Arquette is overly obsessed. There is one funny moment when he visits her apartment and they practice wrestling moves. Martin Landeau (who won an Oscar for Ed Wood) shows up here as a promoter and basically wastes screen time. There are some funny scenes, and there are appearances by some big name wrestling stars (Bob Goldbery is one of them). The soundtrack is nothing to write home about, with songs by Xhibit and Kid Rock. I really don't care much for the fake and infantile world that which is the World Wrestling Federation. I just don't care enough to take time out of my day to follow the antics of grown half-naked men who alternately fight and swear at each other.

This movie failed to make me laugh, and I should warn you that it is a video rental at best; although I wouldn't recommend it to anyone as a video pick of the week. D

Toilet paper is one of the many wonderful props used in the world of wrestling.

Track teams hits Brown

Minutewomen to build on experience

By Matt Brady
Collegian Correspondent

Maggie Curry, Kate Toye and the rest of the Massachusetts women's outdoor track team will try to improve on its fifth place finish two weekends ago when it rolls into Brown University this weekend. The women will take a run at Brown, Northeastern and Southern Connecticut State Universities in a four-way meet at Providence, RI on Saturday at 11:00 a.m.

The women will have a tough task in defeating the very strong Bears' and Huskies' squads. Brown is coming off a second place finish in a tri-meet with Harvard and Dartmouth this past Saturday in Hanover, N.H. Brown finished just three points behind the Crimson in the meet, falling by a score of 67-64.

Lindsay Taylor, a first team All-Ivy member in the long jump and the pentathlon, won the high jump for the Bears. Another first-teamer, Amber Knighten, brought home first place in the shot put and the discus. Brown also excelled in the team events, capturing first in both the 4x100 and 4x400 meter relays.

As for Northeastern, the Huskies sent some members of their team to the elite Duke Invitational, while the rest of the team traveled to the Tufts Invitational. Sophomore triple jumper Theresa Williams was the top collegiate triple jumper at Duke with a jump of 41'11 1/4", although she finished third overall behind two amateur jumpers.

In the 100-meter college class event, Nikiya Reid brought home a first-place finish and Shirley Miller came in third out of 21 competitors.

It will take another strong performance from Curry (Mukwonago, WI) and the rest of the Minutewomen team to down those two squads. Curry came in fourth overall in the discus two weeks ago, with a 137' 7 1/2" throw that placed her third in the all-time school record book.

Toye's run at Dartmouth of 12.47 seconds in the 100-meter dash was good for second place in the meet, while Junior Chrystal Murphy's run of 14.80 in the 100 hurdles also brought home a second place finish for the Minutewomen.

Senior Alison Tostevin threw 41' 11 1/2", an outdoor personal best, in the shotput, while fellow upperclassman Sharon Tillotson ran the 3000-meter in 10:18.54. Both performances were good enough for third place finishes in the event.

taken her last four decisions. After a slow start, Hadley has bounced back with a vengeance, tossing her first career no-hitter in the Minutewomen's 9-0 pasting of Central Connecticut last week.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen follow up the Hawks with two games against the Temple Owls, a young team that can hurt UMass if they are taken lightly. Right now the Owls are 11-23, and admittedly in a rebuilding year, but have a few promising players that the Maroon and White pitchers must be wary of. Temple catcher Ashley Caudill, third baseman Christi Ragan, and Erin Byrne are all capable of doing damage with their bats. Liz Naughton, a freshman from Olyphant, PA, leads the staff.

Brandi Cross took home WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week honors after upping her average to .396 on the season. Last week, she went 10-for-14, which included six RBI in the Minutewomen's slow climb to the top of the A-10. Her average leads the team, also grabbing the lead with three homers and 23 RBI. Her most recent longball came in UMass' 7-5 victory over Virginia Tech in game one. In addition to local honors, the conference recognized her by dubbing her the Atlantic

"Sabrina" the TGIF Witch

By Brian Lowry
Los Angeles Times

For years, parents sat through ABC's "TGIF" block with their kids on Friday nights, watching such comedies as "Full House" and "Family Matters." If the jokes often seemed lame, parents at least felt secure the shows conveyed morals and messages, meaning little tykes weren't going to see anything that would put them in therapy.

After ABC's recent decision to let "Sabrina the Teenage Witch" go to the WB network next fall, however, "TGIF" appears on its last legs _ the victim of shifting viewing patterns and a trend toward edgier fare designed to attract an increasingly jaded, been-there-seen-that audience.

ABC officials, who are currently pondering their scheduling plans for next season, declined to elaborate on the status of the "TGIF" franchise. Previously, the network has said it is evaluating its future, but remains committed to offering programs the whole family can watch.

Nevertheless, with "Sabrina" flying the coop and the fate of other "TGIF" series such as "Boy Meets World" in doubt, few anticipate the network will adhere to its current formula.

There is more than a little irony in the gradual dismantling of "TGIF," which has occurred over the last five years _ after the network was acquired by the Walt Disney Co., an organization built on the foundation of family movies and TV shows. Launched as a marketing slogan in 1989, "TGIF" represented one of the first forays by a major network into branding (NBC didn't begin "Must-See TV" until '93), creating a programming block under an over-arching umbrella to make the whole bigger than its individual parts _ in the process keeping kids and teenagers perched in front of the tube throughout the evening.

"Full House," which premiered in 1987, served as the crucial anchor in leading off the night, joined two years later by "Family Matters," which became a major hit once Steve Urkel _ a guest role played by Jaleel White _ was promoted to a series regular and eventually the show's much-imitated star.

"Perfect Strangers" was another component, followed by such shows as "Step by Step" (starring Patrick Duffy and Suzanne Somers), "Hangin' With Mr. Cooper" (featuring Mark Curry) and "Boy Meets World."

"I think it's going to be missed if it indeed goes away," said Michael Jacobs, executive producer of "Boy Meets World" and the earlier "TGIF" show "Dinosaurs."

Producers and executives assert that the way people watch network TV has changed.

Instead of sitting down to watch TV with their children, parents began seeking more adult fare, while kids gravitated to Nickelodeon, the Cartoon Network and other cable channels dedicated to their interests.

UMass marches on in A-10

By Seth Koenig

After dominating road victories over the first two teams on the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's Atlantic 10 schedule, St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, the Minutewomen are now back home to face the demons... or Hokies.

In the first round of the inaugural A-10 Championship Tournament last year, Virginia Tech avenged an earlier 8-7 loss to UMass with an emotional 12-11 victory to end the Minutewomen's season.

"It's a brand new year, and we know Virginia Tech is a competitive team," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "It's a great opportunity to get out and really play and have fun and compete. We tell the team to pursue excellence with passion. You need to go out and demonstrate to your opponents how good you are."

Already this season, the Hokies demonstrated a measure of excellence themselves, having three players that each have at least 24 goals. Also, unlike UMass' first two conference foes, Virginia Tech has faced reasonable competition heading into today's game at Totman Field.

While the Bonnies and Dukes were on the field with the likes of teams like Howard, Canisius and Wagner, Virginia Tech has faced No. 2 Duke, No. 18 Vanderbilt, No. 5 North Carolina, No. 18 Temple and No. 7 Virginia. The Hokies, despite statistically superior efforts from Dawn Will, with 38 points on the year, Courtney Hubbard, with 25, and Karen Diacont, with 24, could not come out of any of those games with victories.

Aside from an 18-6 drubbing at the hands of Temple, Virginia Tech has only seen St. Joseph's among league rivals - the Hokies pounded the Hawks by a 17-5 margin.

In three games against ranked competition, UMass is 0-3, losing by an average score of 9-5. Virginia Tech has not been quite so successful, recording a mark of 0-5, and falling by a margin of 18-9 per game.

Statistically, the Hokies are an offensive team, which plays right into the hands of the Minutewomen, who are recognized nationally for their smothering defense. The Maroon and White are currently ranked eighth in the nation in scoring defense, holding opponents to an average of 6.78 goals a game. Massachusetts goaltender Jen Nardi ended 1999 as the nation's best netminder, and is now seventh in the country, allowing only 7.18 goals a contest.

After a successful road trip in which the Minutewomen outscored their A-10 foes, 30-3, Denise Brey and company come home to take on the Hokies today at Garber Field.

UMass will come at the trio of Will, Diacont and Hubbard with a quintet of experienced defenders. Three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young, seniors Jessica Passanese, Melissa Miele and Colleen Wales, and junior Denise Brey.

"Typically what we do give everyone a defensive assignment, and zero in on a couple people," Barnes said. "But against Dartmouth, for example, their big scorer scored their goals, but everyone else did a good job of keeping the rest of the Big Green out of their game."

Dartmouth star Jacque Wentzel got her sixth straight hat trick against the Minutewomen, but the high octane Big Green only reached 10 on the scoreboard.

Offensively, Massachusetts is finally pumping on all four cylinders, with 30 points in its last two games. While the Hokies figure to offer a bigger challenge, the memory of the end of last season might compensate as an overriding motivation.

fifth to again pull within one.

Having regained momentum, the Huskies completed the comeback in the sixth, hitting for four runs and driving the final nail into the UMass coffin.

Northeastern loaded the bases with the help of a Senez error. With two outs, junior Matt Keating stepped up and hit a grand slam to tack four big ones on the board and push the Huskies ahead for good.

Sophomore Jesse Santos took the loss in relief for the Minutemen, yielding four runs in 3 1/3 innings. Freshman Patrick Reedy got a no-decision in his first start of the season, pulled after four innings in which he allowed six hits and four runs. Ken Henry, who allowed eight hits and six runs in six innings of work, picked up the win for the Huskies.

The Minutemen will look to atone for their two-game slide this weekend as they travel to Pennsylvania to battle the Temple Owls in a three game series. The Minutemen will need their offense to pitch in with a consistent effort up and down the order, and solid relief work by the bullpen. Although the Owls sit six games under .500 at 12-18-2, they have a 6-3 home record and a pool of capable offense that the Minutemen cannot afford to take lightly.

For UMass, much of the focus will be on Skellington. Lastly one of the most talented hitters on the team, the senior is currently batting .300 with eight RBI's, good for second on the team. The senior hit only 1-for-5 on Thursday against the Huskies, an atypical performance from the usually consistent leadoff hitter. The Minutemen will be counting on his bat to come to life and spark what has been an inconsistent offense at best.

Two bright spots on the Minutemen roster that have turned in consistently solid performances are Senez and Chris Morgan. The former is leading the team with a strong .359 batting average, coupled with two homeruns and 21 RBI. The speedy shortstop has also been an asset for UMass defensively. Morgan, who is batting a healthy .349 with a team leading four homers, has been a workhorse all season for UMass. A threat from both sides of the plate, he is also a solid defensive presence behind it.

The Owls have five players batting over .300, paced by freshman Jeff Roma. Roma is batting .342 in his first year with the Owls, although he has only stepped up to bat 73 times. Behind Roma are sophomores Rob Cucinotta and Jim Tully, who are batting .340 and .339 respectively. Cucinotta is second on the team with four homeruns, while Tully has chipped in with two long balls to go with his 21 RBI's.

The Temple pitching staff is an easily overlooked aspect of the team that can nonetheless steal a game from the Minutemen. Leading the way is junior Jeff Rugg, who has an ERA of 4.18 and an overall record of 3-4. Freshman Greg Powell leads the team in wins, with a record of 4-3, and is second behind Powell with an ERA of 5.30.

The first pitch of the doubleheader on Saturday is scheduled to be thrown out at noon.

Judgement day nears for Maroon and White

By Sean McElroy & Matt Brady
Collegian Correspondents

Match point is fast approaching in the Massachusetts women's 1999-2000 tennis season.

This weekend will be the ultimate tell tale for the Minutewomen when they travel down to participate in the Atlantic 10 Championships in Blacksburg Va.

After a disappointing 3-9 spring (7-14 overall) in which UMass was predicted in some publications to finish second in the Atlantic 10, the Maroon and White are now treading water to stay in the fourth position.

However, the Minutewomen have helped their cause tremendously, and after a convincing 7-2 victory down at Rhode Island Wednesday, UMass now has won three out of its last four matches. This is by far the best tennis that the Maroon and White have played all year.

Last year at this time the Minutewomen did the same thing and ended up third in the conference regular season while playing third at the championships behind three-time winner Virginia Tech and second place Temple.

Helped by the inspiring play of fifth-seeded Robyn Lebovitz, who has been victorious her last four matches, the women are playing incredibly strong tennis. Lebovitz, the junior and team captain out of Marietta, GA, had her last falter in the team's 5-1 loss to Seton Hall on April 3. But her last four triumphs have been convincing, winning most recently by defeating Lauren Sabataso of Rhode Island, 6-4, 6-1.

Annie Hamilton

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Katie Stammen

Also impressive has been Annie Hamilton at the No. 3 spot. The sophomore has turned out victories in four of her last five matches, her only loss coming in the team's 7-2 drubbing at the hands of the Purple Cows of Williams.

Hamilton has also been strong as a doubles player while paired with first singles-star Ola Gerasimova. The two have been paired together for the last two matches, having taken both.

Gerasimova has not fared quite so well in her singles matches, however. After being named to the first team All Atlantic 10 Championship team for the second consecutive season, she has not shown her full talent lately in dropping four of her last five matches. Yet she still has had a fine career here in Amherst, one that places her in the top five in singles victories all-time at the University. There is no doubt that the Russian-born Gerasimova will do whatever it takes to finish things up on a high note in the A-10 Championship.

Postseason finally arrives for Maroon and White tennis

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Hello postseason.

Riding a slight wave of momentum, the Massachusetts men's tennis team finally digs in for the intercollegiate Sporting a 4-10 record in the spring, the Minutemen will look to continue the late-season run in this weekend's Atlantic 10 Championships in Blacksburg, Va.

After a sluggish start that saw the Maroon and White tumble out to a 2-9 start, consecutive victories over Hartford and Fordham offered a glimmer of hope for the conference showdown. Steve Price was redefined in the team's 7-0 thrashing of Fordham but Fabien Rabanal filled in admirably, sticking a 6-1, 6-2 victory on the board to open up the afternoon. It was a common theme for the weekend as the Minutemen would only yield one set to the Rams. On top of that, of the 12 sets won by those bearing the Maroon and White, eight were won at love.

UMass will face stiff competition in Hokie Land, including Duquesne, who is one of the favorites to take home the title. The Dukes boast one of the top players in the conference in Garth Levin, whose 10-6 record at No. 1 singles in Pittsburgh is overshadowed by an impressive 11-4 mark with Jason Maver in the top doubles spot.

In all likelihood, it will come down to the Dukes, Virginia Tech and St. Bonaventure for the title, but the Minutemen are hoping to throw their names into the mix. Todd Champeau has had the most success among the team scoring a 7-4 record, playing predominantly at the fifth spot for Judy Dixon's troops. While Champeau's seven victories mark the highest total this season for UMass, Parna Samii and Will Shaw have been quite the tandem at No. 2 doubles, the pair going 8-5 on the year.

But the player of the year for the conference is SBU's Vili Nurmi, who helped the Bonnies finish strong. Nurmi was named men's tennis player of the week after completing his freshman year with a 14-5 record at first singles, which includes a current six-match winning streak. In this run, Nurmi hasn't dropped a set since March 19. No. 2 Mikko Harkio is also on a roll, concluding the season at 9-2.

Virginia Tech won six straight and eight of nine midway through the year, but has since cooled off some, getting blanked by West Virginia, 7-0 before redeeming itself against Bloomsburg. The host Hokies have been hammered by shields doubles play, as no doubles pairing has come out above sea level, all below the .500 mark at season's end.

Prisco will probably draw the likes of Nurmi and Levin, but he has modest success this year at the top spot. The sophomore comes in with just a 3-9 record as the No. 1 in Amherst.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

With the A-10s on the slate, the men's tennis team will put its money on Todd Champeau, who has compiled the best singles record of all Minutemen this season.

Four's a crowd

Surging Minutewomen play pair of conference twinbills

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 portion of the schedule is underway for the Massachusetts softball team, and the new softball complex will be packed this weekend when the Minutewomen strap on their cleats for a couple of doubleheaders against the St. Joseph's Hawks on Saturday and against the Temple Owls on Sunday. Things get underway at noon on both days, and all four conference games are key for a team that is trying to get a jump on the rest of the competition in the Atlantic 10.

Right now UMass stands at a solid 15-18 (1-1 A-10), but in order for the Maroon and White to take over their usual position as the top softball team in the northeast, they must win now and continue to ride that winning streak into the postseason. Of late, the Minutewomen have proven that they just might be capable of showing the country that they are much better than their record.

After beginning the season 0-9, UMass picked up its play a little and came home from four separate tournaments in Florida, Arizona and Georgia with a 9-16 record. Suddenly, a very young team was blooming and a sour season had turned promising. After splitting the home opener with Princeton, UMass crushed Syracuse in both games of a doubleheader to bring its record to 12-17. Things were getting better.

A complete drubbing of Central Connecticut State and a split with tough conference opponent Virginia Tech did nothing to lower the momentum of the team and brought the Minutewomen to their current standpoint. Last Wednesday, a doubleheader against Rutgers was postponed, and now, if everything goes according to plan this weekend, the Maroon and White will be able to finally bring their record above the .500 mark for the first time this season.

However, this will be easier said than done, because on Saturday, UMass will be playing a team that is even hotter than them. St. Joseph's enters the game with a 27-6-1 (2-0 A-10) record, and just won both games of a doubleheader (5-1, 3-1) against conference rival Dayton a few days ago. Senior All-American candidate Christina Kowalski leads the Hawks on the mound and at the plate. At this point in the season she has a 13-3 record to go along with a 1.66 ERA and five shutouts. Now that former UMass standout Danielle Henderson has gone on to bigger and better things, Kowalski has taken over her spot as the top pitcher in the Atlantic 10.

Kowalski is also the premier hitter on a team that has seven regulars batting over .300. Thus far she is batting an incredible .462 and has 8 home runs and 38 RBI. If that isn't enough she has a .792 slugging percentage that even Babe Ruth would be proud of. C/OF Teresa Andreani (.366, 2 HR, 21 RBI) is another pivotal component to the Hawks' lineup and OF/1B Gail Tresker is batting .377 with 4 HR and 12 RBI despite starting in only 24 of the 34 games this year. All of this means that UMass pitchers Kaila Holtz, Carrie Jeffries and Jen Hadley will most likely have their work cut out for them this weekend.

Holtz, who's just a freshman, has taken over as the team's ace, compiling an 8-5 record with a team-best 2.12 ERA in her debut season. She has

Middle relief caves in, Minutemen fall

It wasn't a win, but it was a step in the right direction.

Almost.

After being blanked by Virginia Tech on Monday, the Massachusetts baseball team traveled to Boston yesterday afternoon, in search of runs and a win at the hands of the Northeastern Huskies. The Minutemen got their runs, but not the victory as the Huskies (10-10 overall) staged a rally and came from behind to win, 8-6.

In what has become a running storyline of the 2000 season, the Minutemen (12-12 overall) again jumped out to an early lead only to hand it over in the middle innings. Senior Shaun Skeffington hit a strong double down the left field line to lead off the game, putting UMass in prime position for an early strike. Sophomore Mike Kulak reached base on an error by the Northeastern pitcher, advancing Skeffington to third. The Minutemen loaded the bases in the next at bat on a Nick Gorneault walk, and scored their first run when catcher Chris Morgan hit a sacrifice fly to center that sent Skeffington across home plate. The Minutemen tallied their second and final run of the game on a Kevin O'Connell sacrifice fly to right field that scored Kulak and gave UMass a 2-0 lead. The Huskies put up one run in the bottom of the first to pull within one run heading into the second inning.

Northeastern	8

Northeastern tied the game in the bottom of the third when centerfielder Hernan Guerrero hit his team leading seventh homerun of the season. Guerrero was 3-for-4 on the day, with one run batted in and three runs scored.

After regaining the lead in the fourth, the Minutemen added two more runs in the fourth. Kevin O'Connell reached base on a single, and was brought home in the next at bat on an Aaron Senez homer to right centerfield. The three-run cushion quickly vanished, however, as the Huskies struck for two in the bottom of the

On heels of two-game losing streak, lax looks to chase down Greyhounds

By Brett Mauser

Crunch time has arrived a little early for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

What it had hoped would be a return to glory has been a shade disappointing heading into this weekend's matchup against Loyola College. Suffering a 9-8 overtime loss to Maryland-Baltimore County last week, the Minutemen (4-4, 1-3 Eastern College Athletic Conference) hope to revive themselves in a major way in traveling to Curley Field.

However, the task of coming away victorious should not come easily, as not only are the Greyhounds ranked third in the nation, but they've got some anger to release. Last Saturday, Loyola stormed into Syracuse, taking a 6-6 tie into the fourth quarter, only to see the Orangemen hang a 10-spot on their visitors in the last act to win, 16-8, handing the dogs their only loss of the season thus far. In addition, the defeat put a halt to the Greyhounds' NCAA record 30-game regular season winning streak.

Syracuse also ended LC's title run last season, dropping the Greyhounds, 17-12, in the NCAA first round.

Unfortunately for UMass head coach Greg Cannella, his Minutemen are next on the chopping block for Dave Cottle's high-powered 'Hounds. And unfortunately, past success, or lack thereof, doesn't bode well for UMass, who is 0 for 7 against Loyola.

After opening up with three goals in the game's opening six minutes, UMBC used a three-minute illegal stick violation to get back into it. Charlie Gibson scored in the extra session to send the Retrievers contingent into pandemonium and the Minutemen with their heads down leaving the field. Where it really leaves UMass is in a world of trouble, staring down four Top 15 teams in the next month, three of which are currently ranked in the top six.

The Greyhounds are one of those teams, staying in the top three despite the loss to the Orange. A tremendous March earned Loyola its keep among the nation's elite, knocking off Hofstra (16-12), Duke (11-10) and Notre Dame (12-2) in successive weeks. In beating the Blue Devils, Cottle and company climbed out of an early hole to win, as Tim Goettelmann tallied the game-winning goal with 2:02 remaining to clinch it.

Loyola won't spread the wealth much on offense, but nonetheless, the Marylanders are considered one of college lacrosse's most dangerous squad's on the attack. The Greyhounds are led by Goettelmann, who found the net twice or more in all but two games this season. This includes a five-goal explosion against Brown just three weeks back. He and Gavin Prout lead the offense onto the field, the latter scoring a team-high 24 goals on the season. Prout has gone for six in two games this year (Hofstra, Brown) after transferring from Gannon College for his junior year.

UMass could be in trouble if it falls down early, as Loyola's ability to score is nearly unrivaled nationwide. Only three teams in the polls score more than the Greyhounds, who average just under 14 goals a game. For the record, the Maroon and White have reached that plateau just three times this season, of course in a more deliberate style.

Then again, Loyola may find the holes on offense a bit smaller this week. Although their 4-4 record doesn't show it, the Minutemen boast one of America's top defenses, which yields just 7.5 goals per game. Twelfth-ranked Navy has scored double figures in all nine of its games, except in its conquering of the Minutemen, where the Mid-shipmen managed just six goals in a slowdown-style tempo.

It is that style that UMass hopes to get into from the beginning against Loyola, and much of its success in that respect will come in the faceoff circle. Junior midfielder Jeff Seals has taken 64.5 percent of the dropped balls this season. The Greyhounds counter with Joe Maier, whose swiped away just over half of his faceoffs this season.

Rich Kunkel reeled in another hat trick against the Retrievers, but it wasn't enough. The senior leads all Minutemen with 18 goals, his career-high coming with a six-goal eruption in UMass' 17-5 defeat of Boston College.

Luckily for the Minutemen, they will be able to work out the kinks in a game that will do more for its morale than anything else. But their inaugural campaign in the ECAC. UMass dips into the non-conference pool after a pair of losses within the league. Currently, the Minutemen are in danger of bouncing their automatic berth bid, given to the top dog of the conference at the end of the season. At 1-3, the mountain seems awfully steep, but not out of the question. Only Rutgers and Stony Brook lie below the Minutemen on the scale, with Georgetown sitting comfortably on top at 4-0.

Goaltender Chris Campolettano will likely be the x-factor for the Minutemen, and he'll have his work cut out for him in the cage. The Massapequa native ranks sixth in the nation in goals-against average, yielding just over eight per game. He made 13 stops against the Retrievers, two short of his career-high that he set against Navy and Butler.

Game time is set for 1 p.m.

Protesters congregate in capital

Groups object to IMF and the World Bank

By Matthew Maggiacomo
Collegian Correspondent

WASHINGTON, DC – Protesters filled the streets of our nation's capital this weekend in an attempt to thwart the proceedings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

In a relatively rare unification of primarily college-aged liberal activists and blue-collar workers, a diverse group of approximately 20,000 gathered to speak out against the World Bank's involvement in the expansion of worldwide corporate power.

At the heart of the movement is a general disgust for the consequences of increased corporate influence in global politics. The World Bank and IMF are comprised of delegates and representatives from several of the world's most powerful countries, and collectively have an indelible influence on the global economy. By providing loans for impoverished countries, the IMF and World Bank claim to assist needy governments in getting out of debt.

According to protesters, the loans centralize and often increase the debt of these countries, while allowing powerful foreign governments free access to their resources. As a result, most of these countries see an increase in sweatshops and a decrease in economic and environmental stability.

Though the majority of the protesters were socially conscious college students, many other voices were represented during the demonstrations. The rally seemed to provide media attention for countless social movements, including proponents of Tibetan freedom, gay rights, organic farming and Ralph Nadar's presidential campaign. The majority of the protest was structured and peaceful, a sharp contrast to the more chaotic rallies in Seattle.

At times, the protest took on a carnival-like atmosphere. There were fantastic visual displays, including outrageous costumes and human-sized puppets. There were drum circles surrounded by hordes of dancing hippies. There were even a few celebrity appearances, including a performance by the Indigo Girls.

There was also a relatively small amount of civil disobedience, fueled by the presence of a troupe of over 100 anarchists. Some protesters resorted to violent physical tactics in an effort to break through police barricades. These people were met with pepper spray courtesy of police officers clad in full riot gear. The police were able to suppress any attempts at establishing an all-out riot, assisted indirectly by protesters who insisted upon a "peaceful protest." Regardless, over 1,300 arrests were made over the course of the week, though most of them occurred outside of the legally licensed protest period.

However, much of the interaction between police officers and protesters was friendly, and protesters often thanked the officers for remaining behind their barricades. Some protesters encouraged the officers to put down their clubs and join the protest.

Though the protests weren't able to entirely shut down the IMF and World Bank meetings, the movement managed to shut down a large portion of the city and prevent many federal workers from attending their jobs on Monday. More demonstrations are expected to occur this summer at both the Republican and Democratic conventions.

National Student Exchange program a positive experience

By David Nakashima
Collegian Correspondent

A tender breeze soothed her tense nerves as she peered over the edge of the 40-foot cliff down to the crystal waters. The pool reflected the pleasant touch of the sun, making it sparkle as blue as the purest sapphire.

That is one of the memories Heather Jenner, senior anthropology major at the University of Massachusetts, holds dear from her semester on exchange to the University of Hawaii. The 21-year-old Jenner participated in the National Student Exchange program last year.

"I wanted to go off on my own to be completely by myself and to see my strengths and weaknesses," said Jenner. Her year at the University of Hawaii was one of the "best times of my life" Jenner said. She said the scenery was breathtaking and the people, "always willing to help out and take me places."

Jenner is just one testimony of the exchange program that sends students across the nation. The exchange sites include 161 universities that span across all the states except North Dakota and Arkansas, as well as Guam, Puerto Rico, Canada, and the U.S. Virgin Islands. There are 120 UMass students that are away this year on exchange, said Sheila Brennan, the domestic exchange coordinator. There are also 163 exchange students here from other universities.

Although tuition increases caused a decrease in the number of exchange students from the average of 200 students during the 1980s, the exchange program is in demand and is on the rise, said Brennan. She said there is 158 UMass students going on exchange next year, 38 more students or 24 percent increase from this year.

"It's much easier than students think," Brennan said in regards to the application process and the acceptance-percentage. Of the students who apply for the exchange program every year, 90 percent of them get their first-choice school, said Brennan.

Brennan said, "The most beneficial thing of the exchange program is that when [students] apply for a job, it broadens their horizons."

She explained how a student who is born and raised in Amherst might graduate from UMass and only look for employment in the Pioneer Valley. On the other hand, a student who participates in the exchange program not only gains valuable experience living in different surroundings, but also has a broader scope of where to work, said Brennan.

Brennan said the exchange program also provides a chance for students to see new places and to take helpful courses for their majors that might not be available at UMass. However, there are drawbacks because it is "impossible to guarantee what the exchange will be like," said Brennan.

Students might not get all the courses they want or the exchange experience in general might not meet up to specific expectations that some students have, she explained.

Another participant of the exchange program is Chris McCugh, a 21-year-old sports marketing major. The junior at UMass went on exchange to North Carolina State University this past fall semester. He had a frightening experience when he and some friends got into a car accident on his way to a football game. He explained, they were on the highway, speeding up as they switched to their left lane, where they unexpectedly

Objections over financial policy ring throughout DC

By Matt Berger & Sarah Lechner
U-WIRE (DC BUREAU)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON, DC – Students from around the country began arriving in the nation's capital Friday, ready to protest the actions of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund during their weekend meetings.

Outside the World Bank headquarters Friday, Peter Graif, 19, sat and watched with two friends as police barricaded the building. He traveled all night from Amherst College in Massachusetts and will be spending the weekend sleeping on a gymnasium floor.

"We just realized this is the first chance to get our voices heard," Graif said. "What the World Bank is doing isn't fair to the rest of the world."

Looren Finkelstein, an event organizer for Youth Speak Out, said the organizations protesting would highlight the concerns of students at the high school and collegiate level.

"These are some pretty incredible students that are going to be speaking," she said.

Many other student groups are protesting this weekend, each touting issues on their agenda. By protesting the meeting, organizers of the student group Free the Planet said they want to bring attention to the IMF and World Bank on a national level.

"These institutions work on a global level, but they don't answer to anybody," said Finkelstein, who also works for Free the Planet, an organization concerned with protecting the environment.

Roger Newell, a member of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said that while the international organization will not be participating in the direct action plans for the weekend, individual members would be attending.

"We are concerned about admitting China (to free trade status)," he said. Newell said that the teamsters main concern was that many companies would switch their production to factories in China. "It would undercut labor in the United States and put working families out of jobs."

While this weekend will heighten the attention to the actions of the two organizations, Newell said that the union continuously pressures companies who are moving out of the United States and lobbies Congressional members. He said after the weekend, the teamsters would continue these actions.

Chris Walsh will be on the other side of the protests this weekend. As a communications associate for the World Bank this recent William and Mary College graduate said he thinks a lot of the protesters do not understand the key issues.

"I think a lot of research has not been done on some people's parts," said Walsh, 26. "I think some people know what they are talking about and try to strive for the purpose they think is right."

He said he feels the protesters and World Bank employees are all fighting for the same thing.

"If their goal is saving the poor, then we are on the same team," he said.

Cold War leftovers debated

By Walter Pincus
Washington Post

Russia's ratification of the START II agreement might spark the first real debate in more than a decade over the size of the U.S. nuclear stockpile, which has changed very little since the end of the Cold War.

The number of nuclear warheads deployed on missiles and bombers by Russia and the United States gradually is dropping from 10,000 to 6,000 on each side, thanks to the START I agreement, which was signed in 1991 and went into effect in 1994.

But in addition to maintaining and refurbishing those 6,000 deployed warheads, the U.S. Department of Energy has kept a war reserve of about 4,000 plutonium triggers or "pits" taken from dismantled warheads, which could be turned back into weapons within 18 months.

Under START II, which the Russian parliament ratified April 14 by 288 to 131, Russia and the United States are slated to cut their arsenals of deployed warheads to 3,000 to 3,500 warheads over the next seven years. But the treaty does not govern how many nondeployed nuclear warheads and pits can be held in reserve, and the Energy Department plans to maintain thousands of spares in working condition.

Critics of the Clinton administration's nuclear weapons policy, such as Sen. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., believe the United States should unilaterally reduce the nuclear weapons stockpile instead of keeping it at the level of the Cold War.

"We have way in excess of what we need," Kerrey said recently. "We force the Russians to maintain more weapons than they are able to control."

Kerrey said the administration and the public "should be reminded that one U.S. Trident submarine's 24 intercontinental-range missiles could deliver 192 warheads, each with 100 kilotons, on some country – enough to shatter as society."

Kerrey's call for reductions in the stockpile was voted down last year by a substantial margin in the Senate. The Russian parliament's delay in ratifying START II, which was signed in 1993 and ratified by the U.S. Senate in 1996, has long been cited as a reason for the United States to remain wary of Russia's intentions and to maintain a large reserve of plutonium and other weapons components.

Since the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991, popular fears of nuclear Armageddon have waned, and the United States has maintained and even begun upgrading its 6,000 deployed warheads – plus the 4,000 pits in reserve.

Moscow's deployed strategic arsenal has continued to decline because of the lack of funds to keep its nuclear missile submarines and land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles fully operational. Even though newly elected President Vladimir Putin has called for strengthening Russia's nuclear forces, many experts believe Russia is sliding toward a force of 1,500 operational strategic warheads, the number it has proposed in preliminary discussions about a START III accord.

Concerned about the possibility of "loose nukes," the U.S. government is spending about $2 billion on programs to halt Russia's production of plutonium, help dismantle Russia's older strategic weapons and improve security around Russia's disassembled pits, of which there may be more than 20,000, according to Stan Norris of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

saw a stopped car not too far ahead of them. They couldn't break in time.

"I just remember hearing the breaks screech and boom, it happened. I had no idea what happened and remember being shook up," said McCugh. He was taken to the hospital and was released with no serious injuries.

McCugh said he doesn't regret going on exchange despite this car accident, saying it was cool to be on exchange. McCugh, a big sports fan, said he chose North Carolina State University because it had a Division I football and basketball team. He initially planned to take a sports marketing course there that would have helped him with his major, but he ended up not taking it.

He said, "It was a nice area that was different enough from UMass." He specifically remembers his dorm as a fond part of his exchange. "It was an international dorm. Everyone was friendly and eager to make new friendships," said McCugh.

Through that experience he got a chance to befriend a few Japanese and Puerto Rican students. "I developed an interest for other cultures and an appreciation for their languages," said McCugh.

Acquittal likely in England's farm vandalism case

By T.R. Reid
Washington Post

NORWICH, England – If ever a criminal trial looked like an easy win for the prosecutor, the case of Regina v. Melchett is it. The defendants were caught on videotape, after all, as they broke into William Brigham's farm and trashed his property. They readily admit they engaged in criminal damage and theft, charges they now face in court.

In fact, though, Peter Melchett and his 27 fellow defendants are likely to be acquitted after their three-week jury trial, most observers here in the Norwich Crown Court believe.

The farm vandalized was planted with genetically modified corn, and in England today, that kind of farming is widely considered a greater evil than anything the accused vandals might have done.

"I feel deeply I did the right thing," Melchett said on the witness stand, after explaining matter-of-factly how he broke down a gate and destroyed acres of crops. "It was the only way to prevent the pollution of our environment by these dangerous organisms."

Those "dangerous organisms" – hybrid plants developed in a laboratory through modern gene-splicing techniques – are staples of the American diet.

Millions of acres of U.S. farmland now grow strains of corn, soybeans and other crops that contain genes from bacteria and viruses to make them resistant to insects and weed killers.

The seeds cost more than conventional hybrids, but they often can be grown with less water and chemical pesticide, saving farmers money. Few Americans have resisted the new crops; a study by the National Academy of Sciences concluded this month that the new genetic hybrids are basically the same as traditional crops.

But European consumers in general, and Britons in particular, are highly skittish about "GMOs," the common shorthand here for "genetically modified organisms." A new law requires British grocery stores and restaurants to tell consumers if any of their offerings include genetically modified material. Most have responded by banning all such "Frankenstein foods," and boasting loudly about it.

The British fear the new plants could endanger human health. No studies have suggested a risk, but this

Reps. learn about China

By William Douglas
Newsday

WASHINGTON – Rep. Gregory Meeks wanted to learn more about what was happening in China and quickly discovered that there were plenty of people willing to tutor him.

"The White House has made people readily available to answer questions, labor people have come in, Chinese dissidents, on behalf of labor, have come in, chambers of commerce have come in," Meeks, D-N.Y., said last week.

"One side says this will decrease jobs in America, another side says it will increase jobs. One side says it will hurt human rights, another side says it will help. There's a lot to consider here."

With the House a month away from voting on whether to grant permanent trade privileges to China, Meeks isn't sure how he'll vote on the issue, making him a prime target in an intense lobbying war on Capitol Hill between the trade measure's supporters and foes.

Meeks is not alone. Congress Daily AM, a newsletter that covers Congress, counts 189 of the House's 435 members as undecided on the measure that would make China's normal trade relations permanent instead of having them reviewed yearly by the U.S. government.

Next month's vote would bind China to the terms of a deal between Washington and the Beijing government in which China would open several of its markets –including automobiles, agriculture and telecommunications – to outsiders country's bitter experience with beef tainted by mad cow disease has made the public suspicious of any new cultivating technique.

Environmental groups are concerned the new crops might harm birds or insects. The strongest fear, though, seems to be that pollen from the plants could be carried by wind or bees to non-GMO fields. "We are risking the contamination of every British crop," Melchett said.

The only GMO seeds that can be planted legally on British farms are those used for small "test crops." These plantings are strictly for environmental study; the crops cannot be sold. Among last spring's testers was Brigham, who planted a six-acre patch of GMO corn on his farm in the flat, lush Norfolk County fens northeast of London known as The Broads.

Brigham said he was interested in the new corn – the British call it maize – because it can be grown using herbicides that are much milder than the poisonous chemical atrazine, which most corn farmers here use.

"If we could grow a maize without using atrazine, that's a real gain for the environment," he said last summer.

But Melchett, executive director of Greenpeace's British arm, concluded that any GMO crop endangered England's environment. So last July, he led 27 other protesters, plus a fleet of vehicles and a large media contingent, to the Brigham farm. They destroyed about half the test crop before police arrived.

The defendants have received consistently sympathetic treatment in the British media – partly because their stance is popular, and partly because of the strong deference still paid to inherited rank and title. Melchett is the fourth Baron Melchett; a title his family acquired a century ago. Everyone, even the prosecutor trying to send him to jail for criminal damage, addresses him as "Lord."

After the raid on Brigham's farm, Melchett made the rounds of Britain's evening TV shows like a conquering hero. On the Channel Four News, anchorman Jon Snow, famous for his take-no-prisoners style of interviewing, confronted the accused vandal this way: "My Lord, are you sure you did the right thing?"

Accordingly, it is widely expected that the 12-member jury will acquit the defendants. "If I were a juror, I wouldn't convict Lord Melchett," said Vic Ready, who lives near the Brigham farm. "Being an Englishman, I don't like mob rule, but what other way is there to put a brake to this?"

in return for permanent trade status.

The vote comes as China is poised to enter the World Trade Organization, which mediates trade disputes between countries and enforces trade rules.

President Clinton, who says permanent trade status with China would create more American jobs, is pulling out all the stops to win House passage.

Administration officials have assigned each Cabinet secretary a group of undecided House members to lobby and to be available to answer any questions about China.

Two weeks ago, the White House announced that 43 governors – including presidential candidate George W. Bush of Texas – signed a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., calling the vote "critical to every state, commonwealth and territory of the United States."

Panel sheds light on warming

By Curt Suplee
Washington Post

An early draft of an intently awaited report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) contains no surprises about the prospect of continued global warming, and comes to approximately the same major conclusions as its celebrated predecessor five years ago.

According to the new preliminary analysis by the IPCC, an international collaboration of several hundred scientists sponsored by the United Nations and the World Meteorological Organization, human beings have "discernibly" influenced the planet's climate and the Earth's surface is likely to warm at least 2 degrees and as much as 9 degrees Fahrenheit by the end of the 21st century.

The group's previous assessment, issued in 1995, stated that "the balance of evidence suggests a discernible human influence on global climate."

The preliminary draft of the new assessment, released for expert comment Monday, is somewhat more definitive, indicating that global warming since 1860 – somewhere between 0.7 and 1.5 degrees F, about 0.2 degree F higher than the 1995 estimates – is "exceptional and unlikely to be solely natural in origin."

But the range of possible temperature increases, the extent of potential sea-level increase (4 inches to 3 feet, depending on how much ice melts and how much the ocean expands from rising temperatures) and the estimates of additional carbon dioxide in the atmosphere by 2100 (two to three times the pre-industrial level of about 280 parts per million) are all extremely similar to the 1995 findings.

In general, improved understanding of world climate during the past five years has "made for a sharper statement" of the human contribution this time around, said Kevin E. Trenberth, head of the Climate Analysis Section at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., and a lead author on some of the draft report's sections.

Trenberth said the remarkable warming of the record-setting 1990s, combined with better statistical analysis of data, enhanced computer models and greatly improved ability to reconstruct ancient climates, have convinced him and many others that man-made "climate change has emerged from the noise of natural variability."

The new draft, however, echoes the 1995 report in emphasizing several areas of uncertainty. One is the role of sulfate aerosols typically released by fossil fuel combustion that may serve to discourage global warming by making clouds shinier.

Other factors include variations in the intensity of sunlight from decade to decade, and the so-far inexplicable changes in the rate at which methane, a potent greenhouse gas, enters the atmosphere. The rate of methane increase has slowed during the past two decades, the draft report notes, "for reasons that are not clear."

"We probably emphasized a lot more of the negative" elements (that is, those that tend to mitigate warming) than the 1995 report did, Trenberth said. And the authors were even more careful to note major uncertainties, such as the likely amount and distribution of precipitation in a warmer world. The authors also determined that potential melting of the West Antarctic Ice Sheet is now regarded as much less of a threat than gradual decline of the Greenland Ice Sheet.

Not all the authors share Trenberth's view of the new draft report.

Our Opinion

The focus of protest

This past weekend's protests of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank ended up being six of one and half dozen of another. Great for protestors who wanted to make a statement nationally and be recognized for doing so, but bad for protestors who wanted to make a statement nationally and be recognized doing so.

After all, the only statement they really made, apparently, was that they could wear black and be arrested; hardly the kind of statement they were looking to make. Protestors had valid points to make about international funding issues, globalism and economic equality amongst nations, all of which were overlooked by the national media.

They can't be held entirely responsible for the way the coverage went, as they do have a responsibility to cover "immediate" news, which would include all the arrests and disruptions. However, there was almost a total lack of coverage of the protestors' message that was arguably just as important as the protest themselves. Anything which brings 10,000 to 20,000 people to Washington D.C. to protest must be important, and the message of those protestors should have been treated as such.

But alas, the coverage of the message was avoided for the antics that accompanied the message.

The Daily Collegian wonders when the mainstream American news media is going to spend its time digging deeper and getting more of the story. There is more to 10,000 people protesting an event than the arrests that are made.

There is the planning of the event.

There is the funding of the event.

There is, as previously mentioned, the message of the event.

American journalism, as attacked and knocked as it is, does do good things. Media coverage of the arrests and problems that the police have encountered this past weekend in Washington has been top notch, but that coverage just hasn't gone far enough.

As it stands now, the only place that the protestors' message will actually be heard is in underground media that is only read and digested by those same protestors.

The Daily Collegian would like to believe that the national mainstream media, which, to a certain extent, probably includes ourselves will attempt to better its coverage of such issues, giving us not only the tantalizing parts of the story, but rather, the whole story. It's something that we believe should be our responsibility.

Presumed guilty

Hamilton S. Rodrigues

When a man is accused of a crime in this country, he is supposed to be considered innocent until proven guilty in a court of law. I support this idea, but recent events show that it this not always enforced. It is not right to say that someone did something without proper supporting evidence, and certainly the three students who were suspended by the Dean of Students for allegedly raping a 15-year-old girl did not deserve to be suspended from school since they were not granted a disciplinary hearing, even though the Dean has this right under the University's code of conduct. Apparently, Dean Jo-Anne Vanin feels that the three students are such a threat to this campus that their side of the story is not worth investigating.

In my opinion, this is not the way it is supposed to be. There is a judicial process that is supposed to be followed for anyone who is legally accused of committing a crime, but in this instance it seems as though these students were automatically assumed to be guilty even though they are still awaiting a court trial. I don't believe that the Dean has sufficient evidence to suspend them from school.

Then what gave her the motivation to make such decision? Since they haven't been convicted yet, it appears to me that the Dean made her decision based on one side of the story. There have been several articles written in various newspapers including the Hampshire Gazette and the Valley Advocate about this incident and some radio commentary as well, and everything I've heard gave me the impression that the three students were a threat to society. But while reading the articles I began to question why no one reported the other half of the story. It seems like the media is trying to destroy the reputation of these students simply because they were involved in a situation regarding a 15-year-old girl. All the articles I have read basically stated that three guys forced an innocent and helpless little girl to have sex with them but they didn't explain much more than that.

The articles made it seem like these students were insane people looking to rape teenage girls, but I believe that the media did not do a good job reporting this incident and that the Dean is making a decision based on the information that she is getting from the media. She is probably more concerned about the reputation of the school than the welfare of these students, so in order to keep things calm she decided to take this opportunity to make herself look good by discontinuing several students' education.

The questions that I want the media and the courts to answer are: did the three students actually rape this 15-year-old girl? Did this girl lie to the three students about her age? Have these three students ever committed a crime before? Did these students meet this girl at a frat party? If so, why didn't the police investigate the frat for serving alcohol to minors? What was a minor doing at a frat party anyway? Why did she go off alone with the students?

I have spoken to friends and acquaintances of the three students, and they all stated that they were shocked to hear this news and find it hard to believe. It is apparent that the three students are well respected by their peers and on the UMass campus in general. People know them by their great personalities and their hard work in the classroom. One friend, who wishes to remain anonymous) stated, "I grew up with one of them, and he always helped out his community and always avoided trouble."

Personally, I think that this incident is being blown out of proportion and the media is taking this opportunity to sell news. Also, Dean Jo-Anne Vanin needs to reverse these suspension charges at least until she gets a verdict from the courts. Further, once a verdict is given she should analyze this situation from both sides of story to see if these three students are actually a threat to the campus. I understand that the student code of conduct allows the Dean of Students to impose such restrictions without having a hearing, but she did not have sufficient evidence to support the claim that these students are dangerous to this campus.

Furthermore, I feel that this is a violation of the three students' civil rights. They are being thrown off campus for no reason whatsoever. Their situation regarding the incident with a 15-year-old girl is being debated within court and has not been resolved yet. Also, they have no prior criminal record on campus. Furthermore, there was no due process. In which both sides of the story were heard.

I am not saying that these guys did commit a felony, nor am I saying they didn't. What I am saying is that the Dean has accused three students of a crime that has not been solved yet. This is a tragic incident that is now in the hands of the justice system, and it is up to the judge to determine the fate of these three men. Until it is determined, the Dean should end the suspension.

Focused on people

Laura Siciliano

America's great advice columnist, Ann Landers, once said, "Great minds discuss ideas...average minds discuss events...shallow minds discuss people." Ann Landers' advice can sometimes be dated or incorrect.

However, the message of that particular quote is timeless and so very true. We are a nation and a people who love to talk. Most of all, we relish talking about other people. The shallow mindedness that results from gossip, speculation and the empty discussion of others lives is clearly evident. I am as guilty as the rest; I love to read People and a juicy bit of gossip intrigues me as much as it does the next person. However, our country's fascination with other people's lives has damaged our nation's level of intelligence.

In Miami, thousands are gathering outside the residence of Elian Gonzalez's relatives. The fishermen who plucked Elian from the waters between Florida and Cuba have gone on the airwaves, demanding a say in Elian's destiny. What right do these people think they have? Do thousands of Miami residents have nothing better to do than stick their nose in what should only be the business of the Gonzalez family and the immigration authorities? Granted, this story does have public interest. However, protesting day and night serves only to complicate this particular affair and take away what little bit of normalcy is left in this little boy's life. The entire situation has turned into a custody battle placing relatives against one another, while the real question of whether or not Elian is going to be any safer, happier, or healthier in the United States instead of Cuba is not being specifically addressed.

Our nation's fascination with other people's lives led to last month's debacle, "Who Wants to Marry a Multi-Millionaire?", an idea so outrageous that I could not believe it was an actual show when I first heard about it. A record number of viewers turned in to see the sickeningly used-car-salesman-like Rick Rockwell marry the not-so-swift pseudo war veteran Darva Conger. The fascination continued as Rockwell and Conger went on television for the next week or so, telling their "side of the story". The only story there was that of one stupid woman sold herself like a piece of meat on television to a creepy, potentially dangerous fraud of a man. The very idea that we live in a nation where this could actually happen is sickening. However, people obviously continue to be interested, as Rockwell just began a nationwide comedy tour, and Conger was most recently seen at a post-Oscar bash...apparently making a fool of yourself on television is the key to gaining fame these days.

The people-centered world we live in has changed the political campaign that we are currently involved in from an issue-centered way to determine the next president, to a campaign where the issues are practically irrelevant. Everyone knows that the campaign is down to George W. Bush and Vice President Gore. However, nobody is really quite sure what the issues are. Education? Abortion? Social Security? The environment? There have been casual discussions of these issues, but no specifics, because apparently it doesn't matter what a candidate stands for anymore. We want to elect a person, not a platform, a charisma and a look, not someone who stands for anything in particular.

Our national intellect would greatly benefit from a new emphasis on ideas. It would be excellent if the campaign this year could address specific issues such as a way to reform the Social Security system or a real solution to handgun violence. In our people-centered world, broad ideas that used to be discussed throughout education are now only addressed in freshman philosophy classes. Do "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?", there have been questions about the Beatles and Presidential pets. However, I have yet to see a question on existentialism. In our pop-culture world, we are losing intellectual capabilities as we concentrate more on Monica Lewinsky and her new handbag line, and less on ideas such as whether or not children are worse off in Cuba just because it is communist.

People are important; do not get me wrong. They are fascinating, interesting, and studying them can be a telling and educational experience. Reading biographies can give a clue as to why events occurred and how ideas originated. However, when we only look at what people wear, who they are dating, what movies they are in, and when they were arrested, we concentrate on the surface qualities and do not truly understand people. Whether we are looking at celebrities or our neighbors, talking and gossiping about people generally serves little to help us or benefit us. We need to become a nation of great minds again, because focusing on other people's lives is not going to get us very far.

Moral right – wrong?

Boo Downs

The 2000 Presidential race is on its way, with George W. Bush battling it out with Al Gore for the world's most coveted position of power. Candidates, with their own agendas and platforms, seek to convince us that they are the best person for the job. For many voters, many of the planks on the platform are lost in the technicality of the issues and the corresponding ideologies surrounding them. The desire to increase Defense spending planks in both candidates' platforms might not be an issue that will make or break the candidacy. Those who are not educated about Defense spending (and many of us are intentionally left in the dark) might not realize that over half of our national budget goes to the military during these relative times of peace and prosperity. With many of the issues leaving us as voters in the dark, we can very well be swayed one way or another by our perceptions of the candidates themselves. When you see a commercial selling a candidate, you may hear about the issues and the numerous attempts to smear the opposition. However, you are actually watching the candidate holding babies, talking to families of various ethnicities, and calmly relaxing at locations that seem to have special significance to us. Since the images register far more strongly than the corresponding voice over, it is clear that the candidate's image is far more important that the issues he/she is fighting for.

With that in mind, consider religion within the arena of politics. The February 7th issue of Newsweek claimed that 90 percent of Americans believe in some sort of deity, and 85 percent of all Americans regard themselves as Christians. With the overwhelming majority of Americans having some sort of religious background, it is little surprise that each of the respective candidates have voiced their love for God.

Given that morality is a key issue in this election (a throwback to the Clinton scandals), religion is going to play a large role. In a nationally televised speech, George W. Bush claimed that his heart belonged to Jesus. Al Gore also touts his Christian heritage, even if it is presented in a somewhat New Age manner. With both candidates shown to have strong and deep religious beliefs, the one potential imbalance in this "test of character" is that George W. Bush took his beliefs to the Christian Coalition. Bush also enlisted the help of Ralph Reed, one time Executive Director of the Christian Coalition and political advisor for hire. Reed, with a history of successful PR campaigns, has his own firm, Century Strategies, with extensive connections with the Religious Right. With this power, he has plans to sell Bush to Christians through direct-mail marketing, among other grassroots strategies. The February 21st issue of Business Week claims that Reed's firm has already received almost $200,000 from Bush's campaign.

The Christian Coalition, perhaps the most prolific organization in the Christian Right, is a force to be reckoned with. Created in 1989 by failed presidential nominee Pat Robertson, the Coalition's mission statement was to give Christians a voice in government. With a huge budget and access to large scale marketing through churches, the Christian Coalition is perhaps one of the most powerful grassroots organizations in America.

With all this rhetorical power at hand, it is important to see where the Christian Coalition stands on certain key issues in this year's election. The Christian Coalition has been primarily a GOP backer since its creation. Such a partnership was believed to strengthen the Coalition position; by backing a conservative candidate, a GOP candidate would support several Coalition supported issues in exchange for the Coalition's immense grassroots support. George W. Bush, in favor of big business, more defense spending, and less Governmental regulation, also is Pro-Life, Pro-Family, and Pro-Church. However, in supporting Bush, the Coalition is also supporting many Republican issues.

With this in mind, warning lights begin to flash. While Bush is outwardly embracing Christianity, it seems that many of the points in his platform are actually very anti-Christian. Christian Christian Coalition, "The Christian's voice in government", supports and has supported Republican issues, it seems that it is shooting itself in the foot by making deals with the devil, metaphorically speaking.

It is written in the "Book of Boo" that, "Self-righteousness is a weak person's morality." Before I go on, I must bring my moral position into light. I am a Catholic, I went through religious education, and I am proud of my religious heritage. Some of the most generous and wise people I've ever met were priests from my congregation. In this, I take my spirituality very seriously. I respect the religious and spiritual beliefs of others, and I believe that they have every right to practice their religion, as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. Personally, I believe that it is important for everyone to have some form of spirituality in their lives. However, my personal agenda is neither here nor there.

Although Catholic and Protestant sects practice Christianity differently, and put slight emphasis on different aspects of Christian dogma, the basic core beliefs are the same. As part of a more diverse moral position, Christians are supposed to love and help the common man, love all of God's creatures, and believe that greed is inherently evil, among others. The conservative Christian Coalition, supporting Republican platforms, is supporting issues that go against these core beliefs. For example, big business, repeatedly harmful to the environment, the purpose of existence rotates around the bottom line and profit accumulation. Wealth is not shared, but rather hoarded by a few. If profits are threatened, the first step of action is to eliminate labor. For those who take Christianity seriously, the mindset of big business should be considered immoral. However, the Christian Coalition indirectly supports this through the support of GOP candidates.

The perfect issue of Abortion takes an interesting twist in the morality issue. The rational brought by the Coalition itself is certainly moral. On their website (www.cc.org), the Coalition primarily states their position on the issue of Abortion:

Christian Coalition's long-term goal is the extension of full legal protection to all innocent human life from conception through natural death. Life is the God-given inalienable right listed first in our Declaration of Independence. The right to life must be established first or there can be no liberty. The right to life has one source -- our creator -- and it is given by our creator directly to the people, not to a government. The fundamental question is, "When does life begin?" Christian Coalition believes that human life begins at conception and ends with natural death. Government's priority, acting for the people, is to preserve life and protect the innocent.

Here, a strange marriage is established between the Coalition and the GOP. It is interesting that the GOP has traditionally supported a hands-off Government, a smaller Government, and a Government who favors deregulation and more power to business. However, the GOP angle of abortion is of a hands-on Government, and a Government with more regulations. I suppose the conservative nature of both groups allow such moral issues to be explored and dealt with.

Another large issue that is supported by the Christian Coalition through it support of the GOP is the favor of increased defense spending. In the statement above, the protection of natural life extended beyond birth until natural death. Increasing the defense budget allows one and only one consequence: greater funding leading to the increased capacity to kill. Such potential death and destruction is not of any natural consequence, but a systematically planned course of action. The commandment "Thou shalt not kill," flickers to my mind.

The Christian Coalition's mission, as mention before, is to "provide Christians a voice in Government", so in their words, "the Constitution can be enforced as our Founding Fathers intended." Also mentioned before was that 85 percent of the population identifies themselves as Christian. In the Democracy we live in, the morality of 85 percent of the population should potentially be on a similar wavelength. How many of our elected Government officials are Christian, and have Christian values? It seems by participating in the democracy, Christians have an overwhelming voice in Government.

The Christian Coalition, while created with good intentions, has devolved into an institution that has lost much of the morality that the citizens of this country cherish. Behind the facade of goodwill and moral superiority lies a propaganda machine operating within the immoral institutions it claims to be saving. The Christian Coalition seems to be very self-righteous, thus is either blind to or fails to acknowledge its own hypocrisy. While every institution is hypocritical in some way, the fact that the Christian Coalition boasts of its sincerity makes it even more hypocritical. Leave our morality to ourselves, and let that influence our decision-making. Then our country can run the way our Founding Fathers intended.

Passover: explaining the ancient Jewish holiday

By Robbie Medwed
Collegian Correspondent

Tomorrow night marks the beginning of the Jewish festival of Pesach, or Passover. The celebration of Pesach recalls the Israelites' exodus from slavery in Egypt. The Israelites were slaves in Egypt for over 400 years, until Moses liberated them. Moses came to the Pharaoh and asked him to let the Israelites become free. However, Pharaoh refused to let them go, and God placed ten plagues on the Egyptians: blood, frogs, vermin, flies, murrain, boils, hail, locusts, darkness, and the slaying of the first born. The plagues only affected the Egyptians.

The holiday gained its name, Passover, from the last plague, which was the slaying of the first-born. During the night when the last plague happened, the Angel of Death came through Egypt and killed every first-born male child. The Israelites could be saved from the Angel of Death if they slaughtered a lamb and painted its blood around their doorframes.

Finally, after the plagues, Pharaoh decided to let the Israelites go. The Israelites had begun to prepare for the long journey ahead of them. They prepared dough for bread. However, they were forced to leave long before the dough had time to rise. Instead, the dough was placed in the packs on the backs of the escaping Israelites. There, in the strong desert sun, the dough was baked. This is the origin of the flat, unleavened bread that we eat on Passover, Matzah. Because the dough did not have time to rise then, we do not let our dough rise now. Jews are also forbidden from eating anything containing yeast or flour during the eight days of Passover.

The festival begins with a service called a Seder. The Seder takes place on the first two nights. The word Seder means "order," referring to the order of the service and all of its components. During the Seder we recognize many symbolic items. The main items are presented in a special Seder plate.

On the plate are the roasted shankbone, which represents the lambs that were slaughtered when the Angel of Death passed over the Israelites' homes, and the charoset, a sweet apple, nut, and wine mixture that represents the mortar that the Israelite's used to make the bricks for the pyramids. There is also maror, or bitter herbs. These remind us of the bitter times the Israelites faced as slaves.

Then there is karpas, the green vegetable, usually parsley. The parsley symbolizes the rebirth and renewal that comes in the spring season. It is no coincidence that Passover happens in the spring! Last is the hard-boiled egg, which also symbolizes the continuous cycle of the seasons and the constant circle of life. The egg is also the only round object on the Seder plate.

One of the most important components of the Pesach holiday is the notion of freedom. It is the responsibility of every Jew to teach the Passover story to other Jews around them. But it doesn't stop there. Every Jew must celebrate his freedom as if he himself was liberated from slavery so long ago. In the Seder, one can learn how to teach the many kinds of people about the exodus.

The four sons, as depicted in the Maxwell House Haggadah represent these people (Haggadah is the book that contains the order of service). There is the simple son, the wise son, the wicked son, and the son who does not have the capacity to ask. The simple son will ask "What is this?" He should be told "With a mighty hand did the Eternal bring us forth from Egypt, from the house of bondage." The wise son will ask many specific questions and he should be taught of all of the laws pertaining to the Pesach.

The wicked son, however, will ask "What mean you by this service?" The wise son does not include himself. And he should be told, that had he been in Egypt, he would not have been led to freedom. The last son is that who has no capacity to ask, and he should be told of the Pesach so he too may understand.

Dan Yagudin: a modern Jewish Renaissance

By Sasha Senderovich
Collegian Staff

A modern Jewish Renaissance man.

That's what Dan Yagudin truly is. A sophomore Computer Science major, he combines amazingly the understanding of the analytical and the artistic, has equal appreciation for math and literature, is a campus liaison of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) and, if that's not enough, he has just been appointed a Resident Advisor at the Hillel House for the next academic year.

Dan's story is kosher for Passover. He is a product of a multiple exodus. He was born in Israel, to a mother whose family came from Czechoslovakia, and to a father who moved to Israel from the Soviet Union. And with all of Dan's family now living in the United States, that brings a total number of exoduses to three per past twenty years. Dan's family has moved across the Atlantic many times. First, to Los Angeles in 1980, where they got hit by riots, floods and an earthquake. They moved back to Israel again, got a dose of Saddam's scuds in 1991 during the Gulf War, and moved to Maine to be hit by the blizzard of 1996 – one of the big, big blizzards, only then relocating to Massachusetts. Dan moved eight times in ten years. "I gained a lot of respect for my mother, because she moved four kids across Atlantic, back and forth, back and forth" says Dan.

In this constantly fluctuating environment, family has been Dan's most important constant. It was the family that in a small village in Israel, has offered Dan a global upbringing. Dan grew up in a village where his family was the only one that did not own livestock, or grown fruits. They were the only non-farmers among three hundred families. Dan's father – a doctor certified in Russia, Israel and the United States - provided medical care for the village. Dan's early memories involve patients coming to their house, including many Arab families who greatly respected Dan's father's profession. The world in Arabic for "doctor" translates as "the smart one," so Dan was often called "the son of the smart one."

"I was so proud of that," he adds.

In this small, enclosed environment, the conversations always revolved around something worldly. Global politics, often disregarded in the United States, were embedded in the national consciousness of Israel. Dan remembers having debates with his second grade peers about which political party is better. "The country is in such pressing need, and who you vote for is where the country is going to go. If you vote for Netanyahu, you won't have peace with the Arabs; if you vote for Barak – well, that's something completely different," notes Dan. Having only one television channel, Dan's childhood did not revolve around cartoons, but rather, around listening to his parents' conversations about the evening news. Similarly, at the dinner table, the conversations about something worldly were prone to take place.

"I remember when my sister was old enough to vote she would sometimes leave the dinner table because she would be so opposed to what my father was saying," says Dan. "But before she would leave the table, I would learn that this country has this sort of government, and that this party wants this, and that this city is a capital of this country. Dinner conversations were conducive for everything, because you have a much wider environment."

Dan Yagudin defines his motivation as a search for beauty. "Beauty isn't a confined thing. There's beauty in a lot of things – there's beauty in politics, in literature, in mathematics – everywhere" says Dan. For him, that's really what one is to look for, and that's what he goes after in life – all these fields, all these interests that he doesn't know if he will enjoy or not. And there have been lots of things that he has enjoyed. "Early on I got exposed to computers. My father bought my first computer when I was seven - I formatted his hard drive five days later, got grounded for a month. Somehow I found a way to make a living out of it later in life. It's been a practical interest for me, my doing part." But along with this practical occupation, Dan's search for multifaceted beauty leads him to exploring the purely intellectual. He remembers how he used to look up random things in encyclopedia when he was a kid. And he owes his zeal to his family's stories that have always inspired him.

Dan Yagudin, UMass Jewish student and the new Resident Advisor at the Hillel House.

Dan's fraternal grandfather tried to escape to Israel early on – in the 1950s – but he tried to jump across the river that divides Turkey and Armenia. But he was captured and sent to the Gulag for seven years.

"He told me that in Siberia, he felt the most free," says Dan. "He had nothing, he lost everything, he was completely intellectually free, there was nothing that someone could take away from him. Most interesting intellectual discussions that he ever had were in the Gulag, because Stalin sent many intellectuals to Siberia. It was a time of horrible labor, but it was a trip for the mind. For me, that's what I am really after – it's not even a life of learning, it's just life, life in itself – that's what it's about. Absorbing knowledge from learning about anything – that's where the beauty is."

Dan identifies himself as being about eighty percent Israeli, and twenty percent American. "When you come to a new country, you can see things in a two-fold way. I can see faults in both American and Israeli mentalities. Americans are tolerant, they have a lot more open-mindedness. Israelis feel that their way is the right way. Americans are much more polite, are much more result oriented, Israelis are much more straightforward, they say to your face what they think about you. But when the people are nice to you, you know that they are nice to you in their hearts." Many of Dan's friends know that his way of inviting people for different social events is a rather amusive one. "You are coming," he usually says, and most people do end up coming. This certain aggressiveness in seeking people is Dan's most endearing Israeli quality.

Along with the search for beauty, Judaism has been Dan's important constant. Dan feels that most important in Jewish religion and culture is simple happiness. "When you have a lot of people who are happy, you'll become happy," he says. "I've always been happy when people sing songs, experience selfidentity, happiness. There's so much beauty in the culture – a lot came out of secular Judaism, a lot came out of the religious – again, it goes back to the multi-faceted beauty. You can't define anything, because you may be denying a certain aspect of beauty that you never get to touch – and that's tragic."

One thing that Dan sees as disappearing is finality. "I'm not to put myself on the back too much, because you stop improving when you think you've perfect," he says. Dan sees his purpose in the constant development – continually and never-ceasing search for beauty.

The Freedom Seder 2000: a sincere collaboration

By Hannah Braune
Collegian Correspondent

Over the past five months a unique interaction has been taking place within the UMass community. Members from the Black Student Union, the Jewish Student Union and the Office of Jewish Affairs have been weekly organizing the Freedom Seder 2000. The event, set to take place at the Top of the Campus Center on April 17 at 6:00, is the second annual collaborative effort between the three groups. It recalls the struggles of all peoples while presenting the similarities between individuals from different cultures. The event utilizes the traditional Passover Seder model to present the Black and Jewish experience through text and ritual. Together members of the committee compiled a Haggadah, the book annually used to commemorate the Hebrew's Exodus from Egypt, incorporating texts, poetry, and photographs in addition to the traditional rituals and prayers. Thus recalling the liberation and oppression of these two distinct cultures.

Besides planning the details of this event, members of the Freedom Seder committee have found the interaction among themselves to be extremely valuable. For most members of the planning committee it is their second year of collaboration for the Freedom Seder. Not only has an event been planned, but also individuals who would have otherwise never interacted, have had the opportunity to participate in ongoing dialogue and friendship for a second year in a row. Along with open dialogue and friendship has come education. "Education is not found strictly in a text book. Human interaction is underrated," says Nikan Hodjat the Activities Coordinator for the Black Student Union.

Through the planning committee bridges have been built between the two communities. While the event itself does not promise to make the same strides the planning committee has accomplished it does hope to have at least presented the possibility for sincere interaction between individuals from different cultures and communities. "We're not believers in being stagnant and if any progress comes out of this event it will be worthwhile," says Nikan Hodjat coordinator for the Black Student Union.

Along with celebrating unity, liberty, and the actualization of cross-cultural interaction, the Freedom Seder hopes to also present the importance of remembering the sacrifices of our ancestors. "The thing I like about the whole Seder is the detail put into the event, it seems so ingrained in the Jewish community. The event really keeps the past in the present and makes you remember what your people have been through and that they have given you the gift of life through their struggles. The least we can do is remember their fight for freedom" says Cornelius Harris Vice President Black Student Union.

As the event celebrates the liberation and unity of oppressed peoples it also reminds the participants of the importance of being alert to oppression today. Difference must be transcended in order to be more aware to the oppression of others. "The human family's survival and well-being depends on our ability to transcend difference; to acknowledge conflict without falling prey to hatred; and to overcome our ignorance and prejudice toward each other" says Larry Goldbaum and director of the Office of Jewish Affairs.

Members of both groups hope that this event and the preplanning that occurs with it continues to be a step towards more interaction in the future. Part of this hope is incorporated through audience participation at the event. The Freedom Seder 2000 included a meal featuring traditional Jewish and Soul foods as well as performances by the Jewish a cappella group Kolot, and Hasa President Genevieve Legros and Remon Iourdan.

Celebrating Passover: A modern exodus epic

By Sasha Senderovich
Collegian Staff

This week will be marked by Pesach (Passover) – by far, one of the most important Jewish festivals. Many families will gather around the table for the Seder, and will retell the story of the Jewish exodus from the Egyptian slavery. Passover is an ancient festival that has been celebrated by the Jewish people for several thousand years.

Yet, it is important to remember that Passover is by far not all that archaic, but rather - an extraordinarily modern festival. Just within last hundred years, there were great many exoduses that have changed the reality of Jewish existence. The most recent Jewish exodus has been the one from the former Soviet Union. Within the past decade, the exodus of the Russian Jews to Israel and the United States has been at the very least massive. This escape alone has ensured that the Jewish identity can be preserved for the people from the country, where expressing Jewish-ness was prohibited for eighty years, and virtually impossible even after the collapse of communism.

There was another wave of exodus to Israel in the seventies, when the Soviet Jews were willing to risk their freedom for the sake of leaving for the country that they believed to be truly theirs.

There were yet other exoduses, another manifestations of freedom that have occurred in the very recent past. Some people even call these symbolic exoduses.

Two of these symbols are a potato and an orange. In 1987 thousands of Ethiopian Jews immigrated to Israel. They came from a land of famine and starvation. Their first meal was boiled potatoes: the fruit of the earth, so that their frail bodies, racked with hunger, would not be subjected to the shock so many victims of the concentration camps suffered when they were fed regular food too soon after liberation. An orange is a grand bit of urban folklore. Many people claim this story relates a conversation overheard at a bat mitsva in a community's synagogue. A woman rabbi is on the bima (pulpit) and a traditional Jewish man in the congregation is said to have remarked: "a woman belongs on the bima like an orange belongs on a seder plate." Therefore many people place an orange on the Seder plate as a symbol of the sweetness of freedom and equality.

Yet the most striking modern Jewish exodus has guaranteed the very existence of the vast majority of American Jewry. This is the exodus from the Eastern Europe that occurred at the turn of the century. From 1881 until 1914, about two million Jews have left their little towns in Russia, Ukraine, Poland and other countries. They escaped the terrors, murders and pogroms inflicted onto them by the authorities in the Pale of Settlement. They left their old lives behind, and - many of them unwillingly - set out for the shores of the new land that boasted equality and freedom. A century later, the descendants of these people have excelled in almost every sphere of American living, evolving into a vibrant, thriving peoples.

This modern Jewish exodus does not have archaic Biblical roots. Contrary to the Biblical exodus, the modern Jewish exodus from Eastern Europe did not register any events of divine guidance. Unlike the exodus from Egypt, the exodus from Eastern Europe did not grant Jewish people the Torah to live by; on the contrary, it did all that could be imagined to destroy the traditional Jewish life of the shtetl (a Jewish town) in the face of the cultural assimilation and modernity. Yet, that exodus, to which a vast majority of American Jewry owes its existence, has saved two million lives that may have been thrown into the furnaces of the Holocaust several decades later.

The modern Jewish exodus that occurred a hundred years ago, and influenced most of the American Jews, belongs duly to the always-evolving, and never-to-be-finalized epic of Jewish continuity. That time there may have been no Moses, no parting waters, no plagues and no burning bushes. There were just people, Jewish people on their own running away from pharaoh-czar, traveling through the Sinai of Europe, crossing the Red Sea of the Atlantic in order to reach the new promised land of America.

Surviving Passover: holiday without pot roast

By Renee Cohn
Collegian Staff

My Pesach memories permeate my childhood: remembrances of the Afikomen Quest, Manischeitz brownies (the ones with the cute little fireman on the box), reading the four questions every year, and trying all of my daddy's insane matzo concoctions. These are as much a part of growing up for me as Barbie.

So, last year, I was excited for my first independent Passover at college, as it's one of my favorite holidays. Tragically, though, four days into it I was sick of matzo ball soup (my grandma wanted to check my temperature after I made that declaration!), thought matzo tasted like cardboard no matter what I dipped on it, and longed for a Bluewall bagel. To prevent the blasphemy of ever uttering the term "tired of matzo ball soup" again, I, in my year of wisdom, offer this guide to surviving Passover in college: it's a whole different strategy!

First of all, you don't have the pot matzo with butter and salt. If you have a sweet tooth, sprinkle some sugar. I always liked the matzo with cream cheese and jelly method, too. If you start to get sick of matzo and want to try your hand at cooking, try the best recipe around - Matzo Brei! The technique is similar to French toast, in a bowl, mix eggs, crunched up matzo (about 1 inch pieces), and milk. In the pan, cook up some onions, then pour the egg-matzo mixture into the pan, and mix it all up like you're just making, say, cheese eggs. Sprinkle some salt on it for, if you're like my grandpa, you might like it with sugar) and eat up. It's as easy as Mac-and-Cheese, and will while away the days of Pesach!

Capitalism is making it easier and easier to keep kosher for Passover, as they are coming out with all sorts of kosher foods that increasingly resemble the real thing. The easiest rule of thumb: if it says "Pareve for Pesach" (or "kosher for Passover"), enjoy! And if it gets too much for you, step by Hillel as they have kosher for Passover meals cooked for you all week. The dining halls also have fruits, salads, and even a box of matzo most of the time, so if the temptation to dive into the Dining Commons cereal bins won't drive you wild, it's safe enough.

I don't know about you, but I can almost taste the Charoset! Chag Samach, and good luck!

Guster is "Center of Attention" at MHC show

By Ken McDonald
Collegian Staff

Guster/ Luna/ Josh Rouse
Mount Holyoke College
April 13, 2000

"So, it's gonna be one of those nights," joked Ryan Miller, the lead singer of the eclectic trio known as Guster.

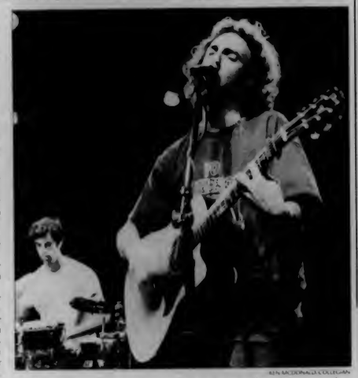
He was responding to the fact that the Chapin Auditorium crowd had practically drowned them out during their opening song, "Great Escape." The sing-a-long atmosphere proved to the naysayers that Guster is not a one hit wonder. While achieving recent notoriety with that "Four, three, two, one" hit, it was clear that practically everyone in attendance knew the words to almost every song.

The night started off with a set from Josh Rouse. The quirky singer / songwriter seemed to embellish the unenviable role of opening up two hours before a headlining band. Like the distinctive makeup of his touring partners, Josh Rouse brought his own unique set-up to the stage. Dipping back into the realm of "real instruments," his band included a trumpet and an upright bass. The bass player, Sharon Gilchrist, had an infectious smile across her face the entire time, as she seemed to make eye contact with each and every person there. It is refreshing to see a band that is having a good time and not just going through the motions.

Then, there was Luna.

An analogy Josh Rouse and Guster is to happy with life as Luna is to happy to be heading towards retirement. While being quite talented musically, playing in front of a pack of screaming high school and college kids was not where they wanted to be.

As Guster's Miller said in an interview before the show, "Bands have a shelf life. The second you lose that momentum, you go away. You always have to keep up with yourself."



Well, Luna's 45-minute set was a demonstration of what it means to be around after your expiration date. Trading barbs with the crowd between songs, Luna too built up the enthusiasm for Guster, actually for any other band.

Guster walked on to stage to a thunderous applause and a five-dollar drum machine beat, immediately tossing bagels into the crowd, thanking us for waiting for three hours, and for dealing with Luna. They broke into "Great Escape" off of their second album, Goldfly. Some were frustrated at first because they could not hear them due the karaoke atmosphere that had been launched with the first beat off of Brian "Thundergod" Rosenworcel's congas. However it became clear that these people bumping into each other actually knew this music.

"It kinda seems like we're bigger here (Massachusetts) than anywhere else in the world," said Miller.

They continued to feed off of the audience jamming through inspired renditions of "I Spy" and "Window" the latter coming off of their first album under the name Guster, Parachute. Has encouraged the crowd to get their lighters out for the power ballad "Either Way." Taking a break from their set list, they covered the classic James song "Laid." The momentum that Miller spoke about was no more evident that when he extended the first portion of the show by breaking into improvisational jams "La La," the newest single off of their latest release Lost and Gone Forever, was a highlight. The trio absolutely became lost in the music, taking a radio tune making it something else entirely, using it to close the first portion of the show.

When asked when he got the energy, Miller responded, "Well, most of it is genuine. We don't do much every day. That's my favorite part of every day we're happy to be there. We feed off the audience: a great crowd equals a great show, a shitty crowd equals a shitty show."

Guster frontman Ryan Miller played to an adoring audience Thursday night.

The second set began with "So Long" and included songs from all three albums as well as something called the "garbage pail medley in which the band played fragments of most of the songs off of Parachute as well as the 80's hit "Celebration" by Kool and the Gang.

The defining moment that made it "one of those nights," however was saved for the very last song. As the stage lights were dulled to a soft white light only, Guster unplugged their guitars and turned off their mics. They stepped to the edge of the stage and gave an absolutely magical version of "More Than".

In a day and age where samples and big bankrolls are the norm for the music industry, Guster demonstrated what it means to be true musicians and more importantly, to be truly happy.

Those that walked out of Chapin did too.

Psycho inconsistent

American Psycho
with Christian Bale, Reese Witherspoon, Willem Dafoe
directed by Mary Harron
Playing at The Academy of Music

Insanity is the progeny of vanity. That is the message behind the thoroughly bizarre, dark, introspective and somewhat elusive American Psycho. Based on Bret Easton Ellis' novel, the film reveals the conscious dementia of Patrick Bateman, your typical appearance-obsessed, mid '80s businessman, and its attempts to cope with the overwhelming superficiality of the surrounding world.

Indeed it is consciousness or subconscious that is the main character of American Psycho. As Bateman reveals early on in his confession (the motivation of the novel and therefore the movie), he is only a physical entity, a being with which others interact – not a real person. Thereby, his disturbed mental state takes on a larger significance as a product and a reflection of society.

Patrick Bateman's society is one of luxury and sex and drugs and whores and exotic face creams, and making monies by doing nothing, because after all, that's what people in the '80s did. It is a society so self-obsessed that a business card becomes symbolic of one's personal worth.

Patrick is a clueless Wall St. broker whose only job seems to be to schmooze with his insipid buddies while trying to get reservations to the latest "in" restaurant. The emotional thanklessness of his attempted normalcy wears at Patrick and his self-realized insanity cannot be contained for long. He soon embarks on a spree of sexual encounters and vicious murders alike.

The conflict of the film arises when Bateman murders a friend, Paul Allen and then assumes his identity to cover tom of the sixth, the Owls went ahead for good in the bottom of the seventh. Sophomore Joseph Lyall led off the inning with a walk, and advanced to second on a sacrifice bunt. Lyall advanced to third on a Tully single, and would later score on an error by UMass first baseman Kevin O'Connell.

The Minutemen saw another fine pitching performance go for not, as Szado got a no decision in his six and a third innings of work. Szado allowed just one earned run, and was pulled in the last inning for Nick Skirkanich, who took the loss.

Despite only putting up two runs, the Owls were relatively safe all afternoon as pitcher Jeff Rugg plowed through the UMass lineup. Rugg allowed three hits and struck out six batters on his way to picking up win number four for the season.

The Minutemen are back in action this afternoon, as the University of Connecticut visits Earl Lorden Field this afternoon. The last time UMass faced the Huskies was on March 29, when Connecticut rallied for three runs in the bottom of the ninth inning to win, 6-5. The two teams have taken different roads since that game, with the Huskies at four games over .500, and winners of four of their last six contests.

The first pitch is scheduled to be thrown out at 3 p.m.

Travis Veracka had a stellar performance this weekend at Temple, but the Minutemen could muster just one win at the expense of the Owls.

sequently forced to leave the field in the second half as the result of a card being issued.

"It was an interesting game, officiating wise," he said, adding, "There were a lot of cards."

The Minutewomen's Stephanie Pavlick netted four goals, while goalie Jen Nardi stopped 17 shots, her season high.

The flurry of first half action began early for the Minutewomen, as senior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick, of the pass from freshman midfielder Kelli Kurtz, launched her 13th goal of the year past Hokie junior goalie, Stacey Rainbolt at 29:27.

UMass' offense went dry for the next 17 minutes, not scoring a goal in response to the Hokies' six.

V. Tech midfielder Karen Diacont but the biscuit in the basket for the 16th time this season, igniting the Hokies six-zero run that lasted halfway through the first half.

Less than a minute later, senior midfielder Courtney Hubard took a pass from Dawn Will, and blew it past Minutewomen goalie Nardi at 27:58.

Will was on fire in the first half, scoring the Hokies' next three goals, her 37th (26:28), 38th (22:03), and 39th (17:13) of the season.

Senior attacker Meagan O'Doherty scored her 7th of this season, when she took a pass from Diacont at 15:10, giving the Hokies a five-point lead.

Minutewomen senior midfielder Rebecca Minaker stopped the drought with her 14th (12:30) goal of the year, jumpstarting UMass, who were down 6-1 at that point.

Within the next ten minutes, Pavlick had scored her 14th (12:04), 15th (8:54) and 16th (2:14) goals of the season, while junior midfielder Rachel Ingraffea notched her 11th (7:26), tying the game at six.

Senior midfielder Noelle Gorski got the assist on Pavlick's 16th goal.

It was an even matched game, with UMass taking 19 shots off Rainbolt, who saved 7 of them. VT launched 26 shots at Nardi, 17 of which ended up in her hands.

V. Tech picked up 14 ground balls to UMass' 13, and took nine draws, while the Minutewomen controlled only five.

UMass has "two big A 10 games" this week, according to Barnes, as they face St. Joseph's on Wednesday and Temple on Friday.

up the crime. When a private investigator (Willem Defoe) shows up, Bateman's struggle to mask his insanity only intensifies.

Christian Bale is wonderfully quirky in his role as Patrick Bateman, creating a fascinating character. His haughty, blaze attitude, spiritual consumption of popular culture, and arbitrary random references to various serial killers make him almost normal in this queer world. Bale is intensely odd and oddly affable.

Here, it is easy to dismiss American Psycho as simply odd, a sort of visceral and visual piece of art without a soul; I was ready to do so myself. However, the film reaches depth beyond its stunning, yet decidedly simple, cinematography and its plethora of incongruities. The film pierces the very nature of identity.

In a society so hollow, so enraptured by appearance, Patrick Bateman passes for normal. People are so stuck in an alcoholic, or some other narcotic haze that they don't even recognize Patrick – even if he's a friend or a client. As American Psycho unfolds, Patrick Bateman is mistaken for almost every one of his associates; therefore, he is left without his own identity. He is subject to how society views him. If society thinks he's sane, then he appears sane. American Psycho seems to hint that there is no truth to be discovered, no reality to be found, only the appearance of either.

Part irreverent black comedy, part dark satire, American Psycho is just bizarre enough to work. It is both funny and profoundly disturbing. Patrick Bateman's irrational enthusiasm underlies this disturbing portrayal of a decadent society. Although the screenplay's sheer randomness is enjoyable at times, it does undermine the deeper shadings of the film. American Psycho is a visual gem perhaps, but too scattered to be effective. B

Christian Bale schmoozes with indie film princess Chloe Sevigny in American Psycho.

Atlantic 10 rivalries renewed for Maroon and White

Sortino's squad follows split with sweep

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

Thank God for Sunday, because if the Massachusetts softball team had to simply settle for Saturday's split with visiting St. Joseph's, UMass coach Elaine Sortino probably would not have smiled as often as she did the next day – when her Minutewomen rebounded to sweep Temple, 9-1, 1-0 at the new UMass softball complex. Although the Minutewomen (18-19, 4-2 Atlantic 10) held a 3-0 advantage in Saturday's game one against the Hawks, St. Joe's rallied in the late innings for a narrow 5-4 win.

And even though UMass responded with a 6-1 trouncing in game two, Sortino wasn't pleased. Only two wins on Sunday against the Owls would help.

Much to her satisfaction, the first victory came via the eight-run mercy rule; however, the second game – the one that would resonate in her mind for two days until the next – was a bit closer than she would have liked. But Sortino did not want to ponder what could have happened without the no-hitter from the arm of freshman pitcher Kalla Holtz, and the game-saving defense of sophomore second baseman Ashley Bakken.

"I thought to myself, oh Jesus, I hope we're not in another one-run game right now, and sure enough, here we are, one-nothing," Sortino said, shaking her head but still smiling. "You only have to be one run better than the other gal. But sometimes they give me a heart attack."

In the most exciting contest produced by the pair of this weekend's twin bills, the UMass defense held Temple's offense to no hits, despite the fact that a number of balls were hit sharply into dangerous territory. Bakken, whom Sortino praised for her best defensive effort of the season, made three standout defensive plays to keep the no-hitter intact.

"Kalla gets the no-hitter, but Ashley gets half the ball," Sortino said. "She saved the day. She had a busy day at the office, but it was a great day at the office."

And while the defense was strong, the pitching was superb. In the first no-hitter of her promising career with the Minutewomen, Holtz showed some series grit after one of her roughest outings the day before. In Saturday's first game against St. Joe's – the only of the weekend that UMass lost – Holtz struggled in the late innings, relinquishing a three-run cushion.

But she responded strongly against the Owls, pitching through her mistakes, striking out five, and walking only two.

"Her whole demeanor was different today, and that's because her focus was better," Sortino said of Holtz, with whom she talked on the phone Saturday night. Sortino said the conversation worked, as Holtz seemed more relaxed, even though there was only one UMass run on the scoreboard as opposed to four the day before.

Trying not to take much credit for her pitching gem, Holtz had nothing but praise for her defense.

"I just stood on the mound and couldn't believe some of the defensive plays she [Bakken] came up with today. This one was special to me. The defense did a great job... people were just all over the place."

While the close score kept game two against Temple exciting, the lopsided hitting barrage by UMass gave game one its appeal. The highlight of the contest came in the bottom of the fourth inning, when freshman shortstop Emily Robustelli ripped a grand slam home-run just inside the left-field foul pole.

As Sortino watched the ball sail over the fence fromthe third-base coach's box, she offered a rare smile, breaking her traditional game face in joy for Robustelli.

"I just think that's the beginning for Emily. She's a good hitter. I was thrilled for her," Sortino said.

As Robustelli starred in the batter's box, junior pitcher Carrie Jeffries cruised on the mound. In one of her best outings of the season, Jeffries pitched six strong innings, picking up the victory while allowing only one run, and walking only one batter.

In the UMass victory in game two against St. Joe's, sophomore Jen Hadley also pitched well, allowing only one runner to cross the plate. The victory improved Hadley's record to 5-6 on the year. From the batter's box, pinch-hitter Hadley drove in the only run of the 1-0 win over the Owls.

Minutewoman center fielder Teri Rooney went 4-7 seven overall against the Hawks, driving in two runs as well.

UMass will next play today in a 3 p.m. double-header at Harvard. According to Sortino, the in-state rivalry between the two programs can't possibly offer as much motivation as her distaste for defeat.

"I don't want to lose to anyone. In-state, outta state, or in Italy. I don't care," she said.

Greyhounds run past Minutemen with 16-goal second-half outburst

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

With the score knotted at five through the first two quarters, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella probably couldn't have asked for much more out of his troops in holding high-powered Loyola at bay. His Minutemen showed him they could go blow for blow with the third-ranked team in the country... for a half.

Unfortunately, it takes two halves to tango.

There would be no dancing on the UMass sideline on this afternoon. Once catching wind of a potential upset, the Greyhounds waltzed around and then all over the visiting Minutemen, throwing 16 more on the board in the second half en route to a 21-10 pounding of the Maroon and White.

One had to wonder just how good the UMass defense was, as one of college lacrosse's most explosive attacks could muster just five goals through two periods. However, at halftime the drawbridge opened, allowing a pack of Greyhounds to storm the Minutemen's castle, trampling the defenseless Maroon and White.

Loyola made up its first loss of the season last week, falling to No. 1 Syracuse, 16-9, at the Carrier Dome, where the Orangemen scored 10 goals in the fourth quarter. Doing its best upstate NY impersonation, the Greyhounds used every bit of the second half to put the Minutemen away.

But the third quarter would prove to be all Loyola (8-1) would need in the affair, as UMass was trampled by an 8-3 run for the Greyhounds. Just eight seconds in, Loyola would take the lead for good, as Peter Haas took the opening faceoff and hammered it past goaltender Chris Campolettano. Thirty-three seconds later, Tim Goettelmann tallied his first of the afternoon after being held scoreless in the opening half. It was one of four on the day for the senior attackman.

UMass (4-5, 1-3 ECAC) finally put a halt to the Greyhounds' charge after they had run off four straight. Alex Racioppi posted his first career hat trick, scoring all three goals in the third to keep the Minutemen within striking distance, but Loyola wasn't nearly finished licking its chops.

After putting up four more in round three to take a commanding 13-8 lead into the final stanza, the Greyhounds sunk their teeth into the Minutemen, delivering the kill with seven unanswered goals to open the fourth quarter. UMass would score two late, but at that point, the game was well out of reach.

It was Goettelmann and Gavin Prout that would do the Minutemen in, each scoring four goals to go along with hat tricks from Haas and Michael Sullivan. The 21 goals were the highest total on the season for the Greyhounds.

Loyola	21

For a while, though, it seemed as though the Maroon and White would challenge the Greyhounds. After falling by two in last year's contest, UMass started slow, surrendering two goals in the opening minutes. However, the Minutemen answered with three in a row, when junior midfielders Keith Gabrielli and Jeremy Guski locked the game at two apiece, allowing UMass to take the lead with John Madigan's 15th goal of the year. In fact, the Minutemen had three one-goal leads in the first half, but Loyola kept responding, including when David Fields retrieved the ball in a scrum in front of the cage, then whipping it by Campolettano with a behind-the-head shot.

Gabrielli did most of his damage from afar, totaling a game- and career-high four assists on the afternoon. In nine games, the junior from Farmingdale, NY has six goals and 10 assists. Madigan and Levielle each had a pair of goals, helping UMass reach double-digits for the first time since a 17-5 win over Boston College.

The Minutemen take a few days off until Harvard comes calling, as the Crimson visit Amherst for a Wednesday matinee matchup at Richard F. Garber Field. Last season, the Ivy Leaguers were one of four wins on the season for UMass, an 8-4 decision in Boston.

Hardball see saw ends in stalemate

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Having spent the past two weeks flirting with a record just above .500, the Massachusetts baseball team traveled to Philadelphia this past weekend in search of answers.

Although the immediate problem came in the form of the Temple Owls, the Minutemen were also trying to remedy a nagging inconsistency that has followed them since game one. Pitcher Travis Veracka did his best in the first game, leading UMass to a 14-3 victory, but his teammates could not carry the momentum into Sunday afternoon, losing a close one, 2-1. The third game of the series, tied at 5-5 in the fifth inning, was suspended due to inclement weather.

The Minutemen (13-13, 4-4 Atlantic 10) jumped out to an early lead in the first game. Senior Shaun Skeffington walked to lead off the first inning, and advanced to third when sophomore Mike Kulak singled in the next at bat. Skeffington scored moments later when junior Nick Gorneault grounded out to Temple pitcher Greg Powell, giving UMass a 1-0 lead. Catcher Chris Morgan increased the lead to two when he singled to score Kulak.

After tacking on two more runs in the top of the second, the Minuteman offense again got rolling in the fourth. Junior Gavin Clark singled to reach base, and then stole second with freshman Matt Boulanger at the plate. Boulanger pushed the lead to three when he doubled, sending Clark home. UMass scored their fourth and final run of the inning when Boulanger scored on an RBI single.

Temple finally showed signs of life in the bottom of the fourth. Owls second basemen Jim Tullis reached on an error by Skeffington, and was sent home two batters later when Rob Cucinotta hit a two-run homerun that made the score 6-2. The Owls would add their third and final run of the game in the bottom of the fifth.

Inning number five brought more of the same for UMass. After Morgan scored on a Clark single, speedy shortstop Aaron Senez stole home to give the Minutemen their eighth run of the game.

The Minutemen posted their final three runs of the game in the seventh inning. Boulanger doubled to lead off the final frame, and Skeffington reached on an error. After sending the runners home with a triple, Gorneault scored the final run of the game when Morgan grounded out to the shortstop.

Gorneault enjoyed a particularly productive afternoon at the plate. The junior hit his team-leading fifth homer of the season, a two-run blast in the top of the sixth. His triple in the seventh that again swept the base paths for the Minutemen was his second of the season.

As the UMass offense went into cruise control, Veracka was flying on the other side. The senior lefthander threw his fourth straight complete game, giving up six hits and striking out seven Owl batters en route to his third win of the season. Powell took the loss for the Owls, giving up 11 runs on 13 hits and dropping to 4-4 on the season.

The second game, moved to Sunday because of poor conditions on Saturday, was a far cry from the 11 run beating the Minutemen handed to Temple in game one. Junior Craig Szado turned in an admirable effort, but received no run support from his teammates as the Minutemen fell, 2-1.

The game was scoreless until the top of the sixth inning when UMass finally got on the board. Skeffington walked to lead off the inning and advanced to third on a single by Kulak. Gorneault knocked a sacrifice fly deep into centerfield, scoring Skeffington for the only Minutemen run of the game.

Late game drought allows Hokies to escape from Garber with 8-6 victory

By Matt Foster

It was a day for milestones at Totman Field as Massachusetts women's lacrosse team clashed with the Hokies of Virginia Tech. Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, it was the Hokies who came away with an 8-6 victory.

With the scored tied at six apiece after 30 minutes, the Maroon and White would surrender a measly two goals, but the pair would be all that V. Tech would need as the stymied the UMass offense not allowing the hosts to put up another goal.

"It was a two-zero game," head coach Phil Barnes said, following his team's 6-8 defeat at the hands of the Hokies. "It was a great game to be a part of. We were in it, we tied it up at halftime. The kids gave 100 percent. It was a great game to play."

V. Tech jumped ahead midway through the second half when Erin Curran, a junior defender popped the ball past Jen Nardi at 17:27.

The Hokies struck again when Hubard beat Nardi for the second time on day, scoring her 18th of the season (7:04).

"I think both teams really turned it up a notch after [halftime]," Barnes said, continuing. "We only gave up two goals in the last forty-five minutes of the game. Defensively we didn't take care of business right away."

Barnes was ejected from the game and sub-

Statistic s show ALANA decline

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

The freshmen admission statistics for the fall semester of 1999 are in and the results show that the newest University of Massachusetts class is smarter, but slightly less diverse.

Due to a larger application pool, the University could afford to be more selective in its freshmen admissions, and therefore the acceptance rate was down. The total number of first-year applications (19,915) was up 13 percent from 1998; an increase in in-state applicants is credited with the overall rise in applications. Conversely, the acceptance rate declined to 69 percent, its lowest point in eight years. The fall 1999 entering class totaled 4,000 students – a five percent increase from last year.

The more selective admissions process brought a "smarter" freshmen class, at least as measured by traditional standards. The average weighted high school grade point average (GPA) for the incoming class rose to 3.26 from 3.16 in 1998. The average SAT score also increased nine points to 1,133, the highest figure since 1989.

Joseph Marshall, the Dean of Enrollment Services, credited the overall freshmen improvement to the ratio between the quality of a UMass education and the cost of that education. In other words, UMass offers a comparable education to much higher-priced institutions.

"It's not necessarily a larger applicant pool because statistics would show that would lead to lower [SAT] scores," Marshall explained. He added, "We're a highly sought after institution right now."

Although there was an overall improvement in freshmen credentials, the number of new Asian, Latino, African American and Native American (ALANA) students declined for the second straight year.

After the number of ALANA students doubled from 11 percent in 1990 to 21 percent in 1996, the total fell to 17 percent this past fall, according to Marshall.

Last fall, Asian students accounted for eight percent of the first-year class; African Americans for four percent; Hispanics for four percent; and Native American students for only .5 percent.

Joe Marshall attributed the ALANA decline directly to Chancellor Scott's decision to alter the University's policy of affirmative action. "We had to change our admission procedure," he said.

After completely eliminating affirmative action last spring, the Chancellor instituted a new "point-based" system to boost minority admissions.

Marshall said that the University had expected ALANA numbers to come in at about 13 percent after Scott's policy change, and even though the 17 percent was a decline from last year's 20 percent, it was still somewhat of a triumph.

"A lot of people worked hard [to keep the numbers up]," Marshall said. In regard to the ALANA figures, he commented, "In light of where we could have been, I'm extremely pleased."

Marshall outlined the University's plan to restore ALANA numbers to their previous levels. He said that with programs like "Early Outreach" and the ALANA Open House (held two weeks ago), "We've got the foundation that we can build on."

Marshall warned there was absolutely no correlation between the higher SATs or higher GPAs and the lower number of ALANA admissions. In fact, he believes quite the opposite is true. He thinks the University is now best suited to attract the quality ALANA students for which it is looking.

Across campus there are admissions goals. Marshall said, "For example, the College of Engineering needs to enroll more women students." He added that one of the University's admission goals should be to boost ALANA enrollment.

ALANA enrollment has also been a hot topic of debate at the Commonwealth College. Dean searches over the past two weeks. Each of the five candidates have received extensive questioning about increasing minority enrollment in the Commonwealth College and maintaining the University's diversity as opposed to solely seeking "better" Commonwealth students.

At her recent interview for the Dean position, Interim Dean of the Commonwealth College Linda Nolan said that many ALANA students were offered spots in the College, but simply chose not to join. She added, "Concern is with students who have a high high-school rank and are a minority. We will address those [UMass] students with a 3.2 [GPA] and get them into the College."

At the most recent Faculty Senate Meeting Javier Cevallos, Interim Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, recognized that the ALANA applications for the forth coming freshmen class were slightly down.

When asked if the Commonwealth College had anything to do with the scholastically improved freshmen class, Marshall admitted, "Certainly the Commonwealth College helps," but gave more credit to "the general recognition that we're a high quality institution."

Authorities discuss campus issues

Police brutality

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students gathered last night in the Gorman Residence Hall to discuss instances of campus police brutality and violation of students' rights with an aim towards stopping such incidents from occurring.

African American Studies Professor John Bracey spoke out about police brutality on a much larger scope, but many students brought up times in which they felt their rights had been violated on campus.

"It's okay to get upset about police brutality, but don't be surprised about it," Bracey said. "It's a systematic problem with the way the system is set up."

Bracey says the problem is that there is no common system in which civilians are able to monitor police officers' behaviors. He said that even on campus, students should exert their Constitutional rights and question the UMass Police on particular ways in which they respond to student issues.

Student Government Association (SGA) Assistant Attorney General Sofia Cozzolino, a freshman political science major, said SGA is attempting to organize a pro-active student group to address the problem of police brutality on campus.

According to Bracey, it is difficult to bring charges against a UMass Police Officer because Legal Services Office can not represent a student in a case involving a UMass administrator or authority. Bracey says there was a time when a student could sue an officer on charges of brutality and Legal Services would lean in favor of the student.

"What kept the campus police in line was the threat of being sued," Bracey said. "He [Chuck Dimare, director of Legal Services] used to win cases all the time. The campus police hated him."

Then, the University decided to revoke students' rights to sue through Legal Services and as a result, Bracey says less charges of brutality have been brought before the UMass Police.

However, Bracey stated that he feels that the campus police are very lenient when it comes to enforcing some issues.

Professor proposes racial coalition

By Alicia Upono
Collegian Staff

Sociologist William Julius Wilson advocated the need for a progressive multi-racial political coalition to combat the rising inequality in America during a lecture at Memorial Hall yesterday.

Wilson believes that social science knowledge can be used to suggest strategies for fighting growing social problems and he has chosen to examine the inequality of both race and class in yesterday's lecture and his most recent book, "The Bridge over the Racial Divide."

He said, "As long as middle and lower-class groups are fragmented along racial lines, they will fail to see how their combined efforts could promote policies that reflect their interests."

The proposed coalition, he believes, will lessen the impact of rising inequality that has steadily increased in the past three decades and ease the burden on ordinary families. The coalition aims to bring various groups together, be it racial, religious or political. He said, "Now is the time to promote a sense of unity, such messages bring races together, not apart."

Wilson acknowledges that though people are still worrying about meeting basic needs, they are reporting to be more satisfied with their lives today than they were in 1994. He noted that economic growth, sustained high labor markets and the high rate of productivity growth may lead America into a period that resembles 1947 to 1973, a time when America experienced growth financially and socially at all income brackets.

Healthcare issues discussed at forum

Pharmacology professor John Walsh compared the U.S. healthcare system with other countries during a forum held yesterday at the Campus Center.

"According to Walsh, an increasingly large number of Americans have what he refers to as "inadequate coverage," with most of these people being elderly or poor."

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The current state of healthcare and health insurance in the United States was discussed last night, with particular emphasis being placed on the topic of single-payer health insurance.

Dr. John Walsh, a professor of Physiology and Pharmacology at UMass Medical Center in Worcester, and Peggy O'Malley, of the Massachusetts Nurses Association, compared the U.S. healthcare system with that of other nations, concentrating particularly on Canada's single payer system.

"The number of Americans without any health insurance at all has been rising," Walsh said. "It's now in the vicinity of about 45 million Americans with no health insurance whatsoever."

According to Walsh, an increasingly large number of Americans have what he refers to as "inadequate coverage," with most of these people being elderly or poor.

"Seniors are now paying 25 percent of their out of pocket income on health insurance," he explained. "One quarter of what they take in goes out for healthcare not covered by MediCare or Medicaid."

One of the factors in the insufficient coverage for seniors has been in long term care. Such things as nursing homes and rehabilitation care are not covered under most insurance plans.

"Virtually no one has coverage" for long term care, according to Walsh.

The lack of coverage causes other medical difficulties for the uninsured. One study outlined by Walsh showed that there was a significantly greater number of women between the ages of 45 and 65 who get screenings for such serious ailments as breast cancer, glaucoma, and high blood pressure who are insured, as opposed to those not insured.

"So, interestingly, preventive care, as well as hospital care and doctors care, are inadequate among the uninsured," Walsh said.

"Our life expectancy, one index of the quality of our healthcare system, is low," he said, comparing the average women's and men's life expectancies in the United States with those of other industrialized nations, in particular Canada, Germany, Italy, France, and Great Britain. Also, healthcare is more expensive in the U.S.

"Our healthcare costs are higher to begin with," Walsh said, "as a matter of fact, the highest in the world."

Massachusetts has the highest healthcare costs in the United States, averaging about $3,000 per person per year on health insurance.

Walsh went on to explain Canada's health care system, and how the United States could better follow Canada's lead.

Canada uses a single-payer healthcare system, which is "a system of national health insurance," Walsh said.

These single-payer programs, like the one in place in Canada have minimum criteria such as: "universal coverage, portability of benefits, coverage for all medically necessary services, and it is finally a publicly administered non-profit program," Walsh said.

"There has been some publicity recently about Canadians being dissatisfied with their healthcare," Walsh said.

A survey was administered asking how Canadians felt about their health plan, when compared to the U.S.'s current plan.

"This is a remarkable result for any survey," Walsh said, "95 percent of Canadians said they preferred Canada's, two per cent were unsure,

African American Studies professor John Bracey spoke about police brutality last night at Gorman Residence Hall.

"Being a campus policeman is a very difficult job," Bracey stated. "It's not to terrorize students, it's just too keep students safe." •

With the University's recent intentions to install surveillance cameras in Southwest Residential Area, many students are concerned about where the line should be drawn between student safety and infringement of their privacy and rights.

Bracey discussed his distaste in planting surveillance cameras in living areas.

"Why would you assume that college students are about to break the law to the point where you have to start monitoring them," Bracey said. "No one in the right mind is going to drag a couch in front of a camera and set fire to it."

The University could better spend their funds providing better lighting in areas across campus, Bracey stated. Even with better lighting though, he added that the police do not get paid much money and in some cases would prefer to do less work. In these instances, he said students should maintain some respect for the safety the police do provide.

However, Bracey said that the police do target some kinds of students more than others.

"If you ask the police why they stopped you, they have an idea of what kind of students are most likely going to commit a crime," Bracey said.

Students such as Remon Jourdan, a senior education and sociology major, feel that students of color are more targeted by the UMass Police. He said that the campus police responded to a fight at the Malcolm X Cultural Center last year and pepper sprayed the entrance of the building in an attempt to thwart the offenders, but he said that in instances in which students light security desks on fire, UMass officers are less likely to use brutal force.

Red Cross workers treat injuries in 2000 Marathon

By Carrie Knudson & Jason Leff
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON – For some, glory awaits at the finish line. For others, the Boston Marathon ends in heartbreak only six miles from its conclusion.

At 1:45 p.m. Monday, the lead runners in this year's marathon made their way over the most feared portion of the course – a treacherous series of slopes located along Commonwealth Avenue in Newton known collectively as Heartbreak Hill.

As a result, several disgruntled marathoners completed the race at the American Red Cross emergency tent atop Heartbreak Hill, rather than at Copley Square.

"We've treated hypothermia, dehydration, blisters and anything that the runners come up with," said Amanda Stern, public affairs representative for the American Red Cross, which staffed 26 clear plastic tents with more than 7,000 volunteers throughout the day.

This tiny tent, located at the peak of Heartbreak Hill, where many runners experience difficulty, contained two cots, Mott's apple juice bottles and several shelves stocked with Vaseline, Gatorade, Band-Aids and other first aid supplies.

By 2:30 p.m., when a steady stream of runners began to make their way up the hill, volunteers stood in front, yanking injured runners into the tent and wrapping others with reflective Mylar space blankets to combat their low body temperatures.

To aid runners with heavily chapped, bleeding thighs, volunteers distributed tongue depressors smeared with Vaseline to cut down on the friction between limbs.

Kala Maloy, a computer operator who has volunteered at the Heartbreak Hill tent since the 1978 marathon, predicted that most of the day's problems would be a result of temperatures in the low 40s and the blustery weather, 10 degrees colder and substantially windier than last year's conditions.

"Today most of them will have hypothermia and blistets," she said. "The first few people that stagger in always have blisters or want something to drink. After that, we never know what we're going to get."

Throughout her 22 years working at the Red Cross tent, Maloy said the least conventional injuries have come from the spectators rather than the marathoners. All through the race, the tent was swamped by small children suffering from cuts and bruises and other crowd-induced injuries. When Maloy began, many cases dealt with overzealous college students who stumbled to the tent in a drunken stupor.

Since alcohol was banned from the race route 10 years ago, there has been a marked decrease in the number of alcohol-related incidents, she said. The number of runners stopping by the tent and the number of ambulance calls made have also decreased dramatically.

"The people are all in better shape and are running regularly," she said. "There used to be a lot of these people who started running a few weeks before the marathon and figured they could go the distance. Now, even a lot of the bandits can make it at least 20 miles."

"We stick people in cars," she said. "If they're cold, we'll turn on the heat. If they're hot, we'll turn on the air conditioning. Other people, we'll feed potato chips to get them some salt."

The time between 1947 and 1973 Wilson describes as a "rising tide that, indeed, lifted all boats." Boats, his metaphor for income brackets, did rise, according to his data. At that time "the poor were becoming less poor, not only in relative terms but in absolute terms as well," he said.

However, this pattern changed in the early 1970s. He explained that the average family income continued to grow, especially for the top five percent, while the lower classes experienced annual decline. Had the post World War II period continued, a male with a high school diploma and five years worth of work experience would have been making approximately $33,000 a year today. But, he said, with the decline in wages for the working class since the 1970s, that man makes $13,000.

The working class also saw a new addition to the work force during this period: women. "Women flooded the labor market, many out of choice but a sizeable amount out of necessity."

Wilson added, "Working class citizens felt economically pinched, barely able to maintain current standards of living on two incomes." Additional data from 1996 shows that 7.5 million workers hold two or more jobs, an increase of 65 percent since 1980.

Although America is closer to our post-WWII period today than the country was a decade ago, he said that the 1947-1973 period was unique because both macro economic and social policies contributed to the broadly equal pattern of family economic progress. He said that national economic policies have changed significantly since then.

Taxes, trade, affirmative action and medical leave are policies, Wilson thinks, should be addressed by a coalition. He wishes for "an earnest national debate on the government social and economic policies and prompt public officials to consider seriously the effects of their actions – or inaction – on a broad range of issues that impact vulnerable families."

He added that he does not view the coalition as a formation of a third political party nor aligned with either of the major political parties. Although, Wilson said, "I wouldn't be too upset if there was a progressive coalition aligned with the Democrats."

The non-partisan party Wilson believes may have already started to take root.

Wilson's lecture was the fifth in the annual Sidney Kaplan Memorial Lecture Series, a man with whom Wilson knew when he worked at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst from 1966 to 1972. Along with "The Bridge over the Racial Divide," he has written several other books, received 32 honorary degrees, been named one of 25 most influential Americans by Time, spent many years at the University of Chicago and is currently a professor at Harvard University.

Georgetown College students shocked

The Hoya (Georgetown U.)

Capital protesters arrested

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – When Marc Aqui (MSB '01) walked downtown on Saturday afternoon to participate in a peaceful teach-in, he had no idea that he would spend over four hours on a bus with his hands tied behind his back.

He didn't expect to spend the night in a D.C. holding cell the size of a small Georgetown classroom with 70 other people without access to a private bathroom. He didn't know that his right wrist would be tied to his left ankle or to his other wrist so tightly that, two days later, he still had not regained a complete range of motion in his hands.

When Matt Smith (SFS '01) brought his 19-year-old brother on a tour of D.C. that same day to help him decide whether he wanted to matriculate to Georgetown, he had no idea that the events of the next 22 hours would been enough to turn his brother off from D.C. and Georgetown for a long time to come.

He did not expect to be separated from his brother for 21 of those hours without any knowledge of his whereabouts, or to sit in a poorly ventilated cell at a D.C. mental institution with 60 other people.

He did not realize it was possible for an American citizen to be held in police custody without the privileges of a phone call, without having his rights read to him, without access to a lawyer and without knowledge of the charges against him for 17 hours.

For these two Georgetown undergraduates (as well as Conrad Malcolm (COL '00), who did not plan to release details regarding his arrest), the events of this past weekend overturned quite a few of their perceptions of the legal system and the idea of civil rights. All three almost literally stumbled into the heart of the conflict between groups American's right to assemble in protest and the rights of the police to control these large crowds.

Although Aqui, Smith and Malcolm were three of many Georgetown students who left campus to either participate in or observe this weekend's protests (whether they planned to or not), their experiences proved to be more eventful than most, as they and over 600 people were arrested Saturday and 20 near the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund for parading without a permit.

Twenty Georgetown Solidarity-led students attended the protest with the intention of civil disobedience, but none of these students were detained or arrested. Aqui did not intend to protest the WTO of the IMF when he and a friend from the University of Maryland approached the action at 2:30 p.m. He went to learn more about the issues surrounding the protest at a teach-in led by the Mobilization for Global Justice.

But the two students never reached the teach-in, which had been raided by the police several hours earlier. Instead, on their way to find another teach-in, they joined a group of people marching in protest of the Political Industrial Complex, something neither was interested in protesting. They shadowed the group, asking them questions, listening to the protesters and absorbing the scene around them. Before they could separate from the march, the police forced the group to walk in the opposite direction along 20th St. until they reached a police blockade at K St. where, according to Aqui, several pedestrians who were not involved in the protest got caught up in the crowd.

Smith was one of those pedestrians. He and his brother happened upon the protest when they were walking along 20th St. looking for a Metro station. Smith said he could hear protesters but didn't know what areas of the city they were occupying, and he was not aware that he would soon be in the presence of an illegal "parade." He remembered the group of protesters turning the corner on the opposite side of the St., and the St. suddenly began to fill up with people. As the two proceeded down the block, they soon encountered a newly erected police blockade, and the police refused to let them out of the block.

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

Our Opinion

The lowest of the low

It is probably safe to say that nobody likes a cheater. In sports in particular, anyone who finds it necessary to break or even bend the rules in order to gain an advantage is typically regarded with a high degree of disdain. But there are some instances in which the manner of cheating is so horrific, so unbelievable, so utterly despicable that the perpetrator deserves a new distinction in the annals of shame and disgrace.

Two competitors in the wheelchair division of Monday's Boston Marathon are worthy of such denigration. In fact, we at the Collegian feel that the Boston Athletic Association's adjudication committee would be perfectly justified in going beyond its disqualification of the two individuals and pursuing actual criminal charges against the pair.

Their crime? Pretending to be disabled.

Yes, that's right. These two individuals entered the wheelchair division of the 26-mile race despite the fact that they are admittedly "able-bodied." In fact, race regulations required the two to not only declare a disability that warranted inclusion in the division, but also to elaborate on their prospective handicaps in order to be categorized into a subgroup of the division. These subgroups are based on the degree of inpairment experienced by the individual.

So in short, these two men repeatedly lied to race officials about nonexistent medical limitations in order to gain entry into the division, which they had very little chance of winning in the first place.

Despite the seemingly inexcusable level of deceit employed by the pair, those with actual impairments weren't significantly angered by the incident. Todd Hatfield, program manager of national coordinating body Wheelchair Sports USA, stated that many handicapped athletes welcome the challenge of able-bodied competitors and view their adversaries as the disadvantaged ones in such a race.

"If they're willing to work that hard – typically they're carrying some extra weight, because of the legs and so forth – they might want the competition," said Hatfield in an Associated Press story on the incident. "But I just can't imagine an A.B. [able-bodied person] wanting to get in and push a racing chair. These people must have been very hardcore."

Hardcore? Maybe. Criminal? Definitely.

If an individual were to fake a debilitative condition in order to obtain prescription medication, that offense is considered criminal. Ditto for an employee who uses a non-existent disability to collect benefits or compensation from his or her employer. Something as simple as parking in a parking space designated for the handicapped can earn someone a hefty fine.

So how are these two men exempt from legal ramifications for their actions?

Quite simply, those within the handicapped community typically aren't asking for any sort of special or preferential treatment because of their conditions. In fact, racing against able-bodied competitors gives many wheelchair athletes an opportunity to prove that their "limiting" conditions aren't actually limiting at all.

But the fact remains that by betraying the confidence of the rest of the division and race officials, the two cheaters in the wheelchair division of the Boston Marathon undermined the very significance and importance of having the division in the first place.

For that, the pair deserves to be punished to a higher degree than just disqualification and public ridicule.

A funding framework for SLSO

The Student Legal Services Office (SLSO) receives its funding from two sources: the Graduate Student Senate and the Student Government Association. To date, the SGA/GSS funding split has been 75-25 percent, respectfully, of the total SLSO budget. This policy came from the Legal Services Advisory Board some years back and was written into the SLSO by-laws. In this advisory board the SGA and the GSS, along with input from the Legal Services director Charles Dimare, decide what they think the SLSO's budget should be. It's in the context of this decision that the 75-25 percent funding split occurs. For the past few years, the advisory board has not been a functional part of the decision making process. As a result, the director and staff of SLSO have formulated the budget and the governing bodies would then decide how much to allocate during their annual budget hearings.

For the last five years, the GSS has not been able to fund 25 percent of the SLSO budget. This is because the 25 percent that GSS is supposed to fund SLSO is 30 percent of the GSS budget. The 75 percent that the SGA has been funding make up only 12 percent of their total budget. The SGA has an annual budget of $1.6 million whereas the GSS has an annual budget of $275,000. This is because the SGA has a larger constituency and therefore brings in more money. Having to spend almost one-third of its total budget on the SLSO has put a disproportionate burden on the GSS, compared to the SGA's funding at one-seventh of their total budget. It is in the context of this disproportionate strain that the GSS has proposed a new funding framework for the SLSO. Instead of differential funding allocation for the SLSO budget, we proposed that an equal percentage of the SGA and GSS budget be allocated to fund Legal Services. In other words, the Graduate Student senate would give 16 percent of its annual budget to the SLSO and we asked the SGA to do the same. If the SGA and GSS both give 16 percent of their total budget, Student Legal Services will be fully funded.

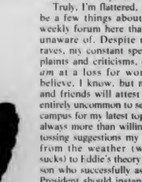
Jon Zibbell

This proposal is completely fair because each governing body will allocate a percentage of their total budget to fund SLSO. Some have argued that because graduate students make up 25 percent of the student population, or they use 25 percent of the services, the GSS should fund 25 percent of the total SLSO budget. As mentioned above, the GSS cannot afford to fund SLSO with one-third of their total budget and in doing so puts a disproportionate strain on the GSS. In addition, since SLSO is a public institution and outwardly states that it upholds indigent law, the current consumer model is an unethical funding and operating framework.

A "you get what you pay for" model of legal services in which each organization pays a rate proportional to the size of the student body it represents, is not only unfair and unethical, but it replicates the consumer fee-for-service model that we desperately need to abandon. Since the very purpose of SLSO, as written in their mission statement, is to offer free legal services to any student who cannot afford them, it is the responsibility of the entire student community to lend its full and fair support.

If we think of the SGA and GSS as legal persons with annual incomes, each person should give an equal percentage of their income, or in this case their annual budget, to fund SLSO. This creates a fair system for everyone because both groups will contribute an equal portion of their budget to SLSO. To say that GSS should pay 30 percent of its budget and the SGA should pay 12 percent is completely unfair. To propose that graduate students pay fees if GSS cannot afford to pay 30 percent of its budget goes against the mission of the SLSO, indigent law and public legal services. It's only in terms of a "you get what you pay for" model that the GSS can be framed as "slacking" or not funding our share of the SLSO budget. How can this be when GSS has been paying between 25-34 percent of our budget whereas the SGA is paying between 12-14 percent of theirs? There is no way that Student Legal Services can back such a consumer fee-for-service model without going against indigent law and the American Bar Association's juridical ethics for a public institution.

The Graduate Student Senate is committed to working with the SLSO in finding other funding sources to hire a fourth attorney, further their litigation rights, and maintain pay increases for the workers. The Graduate Student Senate values SLSO but is unable to keep up with the current 75-25 funding proposal. Therefore GSS is moving towards a more fair and equitable funding framework. While funding priorities of the two student populations vary considerably, it is the organization's position that the SGA, GSS, and SLSO must engage in a productive dialogue and work towards finding solutions through which SLSO can generate additional funds to our financial contributions. However, these discussions need to be based in juridical ethics while embracing public indigent law. Until the SGA reformulates its funding proposal to the mission of SLSO and public legal ethics there will continue to be an ideological and political rift between the two governing bodies. Let us maintain access to legal services for everyone regardless of the amount of services "paid for" while simultaneously embracing a fair and ethical funding framework that maintains indigence along with the mission of a public institution of law.



Jon E. Zibbell is the Executive Officer of the Graduate Student Senate.

My trip to the supermarket

Now, I realize that every other Wednesday, students around campus and throughout the entire Pioneer Valley gather with friends and family to read the newest Dana Oppedisano column. Amidst the laughter and enjoyment, many may ask themselves, "where in the world does a smart, good-looking guy like Dana come up with all of this stuff? Not only are his arguments incredibly persuasive and thought-provoking, but his words flow like wine, his sense of humor is truly one-of-a-kind, and I swear that somehow we both seem to feel the same way about everything."

Truly, I'm flattered, but there may be a few things about my little bi-weekly forum here that you may be unaware of. Despite my rants and raves, my constant spewing of complaints and criticisms, occasionally I am at a loss for words. Hard to believe, I know, but my roommate and friends will attest that it is not entirely uncommon to see me scouring campus for my latest topic. People are always more than willing to help out, tossing suggestions my way that vary from the weather (which clearly sucks) to Eddie's theory on how a person who successfully assassinates the President should instantly inherit the office. Thus, setting in motion an executive branch that would resemble that Schwarzenegger flick The Running Man more than a political body.

Of course, the knowledge that so many here at UMass depend on my words each week also keeps me a little more alert in terms of prospective subjects. For this reason, every so often, a topic just seems to jump out of nowhere. This rare phenomenon occurred this past Sunday, when I made one of what seems like endless trips to the Super Shop & Stop on Route 9 in Hadley. Of course, I've been to the supermarket literally thousands of times. I was that little chubby kid who used to force myself to go with my mother, just so that she would buy an ample supply of Double Stuffs and Cool Ranch Doritos. Lucky for me, I've thinned out a bit since then, but not so lucky is the fact that since coming to college, I've learned how my mother felt when she had to reach deeper into her pocket book with every item scanned.

Dana Oppedisano

My roommate and I are the two goofs that keep Stop & Shop in business, going there for milk and butter, and leaving with empty pockets and food that has been collecting dust on my shelf for months. I still can't believe they duped us on the 10 cheese logs for the price of five deal a few weeks back.

Anyhow, despite the fact that I lost the bowl haircut a long time ago, I felt myself reduced to the scared little 10-year-old in line again when my roommate left me for a minute. We've all been there before, when you forget that one crucial item, and the person who is going to pay (be it his debit card or because he owes me a few bucks) decides that he can go get that item and be back long before the seemingly endless line moves an inch. Now, somehow or another, this line, which starts out longer than the one for Space Mountain, manages to fly right through the moment that this person says, "Don't worry, I'll be right back." So, I load all the food on the conveyer belt, making sure to place dividers at the appropriate position, and look to the magazine racks for stories of sex and sleaze. Mind you, at this moment in time, I have no idea that the line is going to accelerate to kick-ass speed, so I pick up some light reading material to kill a few minutes.

Since I can't read entire articles, nor do I care to know how an alien abducted and impregnated Rosie O'Donnell, I just flip through a few pages and glance at a few pictures. That's where I came across an advertisement that somewhat intrigued me. This full-page ad featured an incredibly beautiful naked woman, lying on her stomach, staring into the camera with a seductive gaze. Beneath this goddess read the caption: "PERRY ELLIS FOR MEN." While I stared at this incredible woman, I couldn't help but ask myself what the hell this woman has to do with men's clothing. Please, don't get me wrong here, I fully appreciate and readily look at any advertisement that wishes to depict beautiful supermodels in their birthday suits, but I don't know. Is there some kind of hidden meaning in there somewhere? Maybe it is just me, but shouldn't there be some type of clothing displayed in an ad geared to sell men's wear?

Perhaps the marketing department over at Perry Ellis feels that men are so shallow and narrow-minded that the only thing that will hold our attention is a naked woman. Or wait, maybe this is it: if I wear Perry Ellis clothing, then maybe... yeah, that's gotta be it... I can get a gorgeous woman like the one in this picture! I do own a few Perry Ellis shirts, so maybe I have somehow been fooled by the corporate machine at Perry Ellis. Or, maybe in this day and age of materialism I am no less superficial than the next guy... but then again, maybe I just saw a nice shirt, so I bought it. I did get to see a naked woman, but I do feel like maybe an advertisement should in some way depict the product it is intended to sell. Sorry, Perry Ellis, but this ad would have been more fitting for a Hollywood Boulevard pimp than for men's clothing.

I finish laughing to myself, and then I look up to discover that my cashier is asking if I have a Stop & Shop card. I proudly do, since they save me so much cash, and my stomach sinks. As a child, this is the scariest moment in the supermarket. The little kid by himself can't pay for these groceries any more than the 20-year-old with no money can, but the fear still surfaces. If my friend doesn't show up, will they toss me a stylish blue blazer and force me to ask "paper or plastic?" all afternoon? Even more terrifying is the thought that I may hold up this long line of people that I couldn't care less about behind me. My head whips to and fro as the sweat on my brow begins to bead. The build up on my brow, before my buddy shows up with the can of air freshener that we somehow forgot all about. My heartbeat slows to normal, and I even take it easy on the pimple-faced bagger who prays that I tell him plastic is fine. Since this is on my buddy, I slyly bury that mag beneath one of our Pepsi 12-packs (at a can't-miss 10 cases for 30 bucks, who can resist that?) because maybe I am superficial, or maybe I just want to know when Rosie is due with E.T.'s lovechild.

GLBT Issues

Betty DeGeneres speaks on GLBT family life

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Several weeks ago, at a meeting of the Pride Alliance (the undergraduate GLBT organization at UMass), it was mentioned that Betty DeGeneres, the mother of comedian Ellen DeGeneres, would be speaking at the Acting for Campus Transformation [ACT] Conference.

"What's the point of that?" asked one member. "Isn't that sort of like paying Madonna's father to come speak?"

This was a reaction shared by many, until it was explained that Betty DeGeneres is far more than merely the mother of a famous person. She is the author of the Pulitzer-Prize nominated Love, Ellen: A Mother/Daughter Journey, as well as the only heterosexual spokesperson for the Gay and Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay rights organization.

DeGeneres' lecture at the conference, the First Annual Western/Central Massachusetts Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth Safe Colleges Conference, dealt with the importance of being honest about ones' sexuality.

"So many people think they've never met a gay person," DeGeneres said. "If you think that, it's just an abstraction. There was a legislator in North Dakota who said, 'We don't have any gays in North Dakota,' she laughed.

DeGeneres went on to praise HRC speaker Donna Redwing, who announces her homosexuality every time she has a pleasant conversation with a stranger. "Donna told me she does it because that way, nobody could say they hadn't met a gay person," DeGeneres said.

DeGeneres admitted that, when Ellen came out to her at the age of 20, she "didn't take it well.

"I didn't' have the best reaction, but I didn't have the worst reaction, either," she said. "As parents, we don't think, 'Gee, one of my children may be gay.' We just don't give it a second thought. When Ellen came out to me, my first reaction was that I'd never see a wedding picture. Later I realized – that was my dream. That wasn't her dream.

"When she told me, she burst out crying," she continued. "I hugged her, but I didn't know what to do. There was no question that we could have a close relationship, but I had to get used to the idea."

DeGeneres obviously did get used to it, and now is not only HRC's only straight spokesperson, but also the oldest.

"Generally, it's a one-year honorary position, but I've found my niche," she said. "It's quite exciting. Three times now I've been mistaken for Dave Letterman's mom. When I've told them that I'm Ellen's mom, they're just as impressed.

"I do a lot of good through my visibility," she said. "I met a [gay] man at a party, whose mother called him from Ohio after my interview with Diane Sawyer. She said, 'If she can say that on national TV, then I guess we can talk.'"

She went on to describe her experiences dealing with the family and friends of gays and lesbians.

"One man told me, my cousin is a lesbian," she said. "Then he said, 'Wow, I've never used that word before!' I responded, 'Well, start using it!'"

After her lecture, DeGeneres took questions from the audience. One man asked if she had ever had fears for her or her daughter's safety after the famous coming-out episode of Ellen.

"I was worried about [her safety] when I found out that she was gay," she said. "My daughter had never been discriminated against in anyway, and now she was a target."

In response to man who asked her advice about dealing with his lesbian daughter, DeGeneres said, "I have a simple prescription about coming out. When a child or parent or sibling comes out, they're not changed at all. They're giving you the gift of understanding."

Sloan humors crowd at safe college conference

By Meg Hebert
Collegian Staff

Comedian Judith Sloan had attendees of the First Western/Central Massachusetts Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth Safe Colleges Conference smiling, laughing, and nodding in agreement as she acted out various scenes in her performance titled, "The Sloan Ranger," The April 15 conference was a big success, and Sloan's work was no exception.

Aunt (pronounced "ant") Edith from Miami was Sloan's first impression. Aunt Edith, a dramatic smoker (even while speaking on the phone), spoke with a New York/show biz accent, "Dahling, sweethot, how about connections, are you making connections?" Edith was quite concerned about her niece moving along in show business. All kinds of people, even strangers love to give Sloan advice, and feel that her making it to TV is of primary importance.

Between impressions, Sloan spoke about relevant issues. For instance, she has noticed that when homosexuality is brought up, many people obsess about sex, and their language reveals this. One phrase that Sloan has heard from other people when they refer to gays in the military is, "There will be a cleavage in the military." Someone else refereed to a homosexual topic as a "penetrating issue." These statements support what Betty DeGeneres and others have noted. When heterosexuality is discussed, the emphasis is on "hetero" while the emphasis is on "sex" when homosexuality is mentioned.

Sloan's next monologue took place in a posh Upper East Side New York restaurant. At this restaurant the costly dishes have a slender piece of fish and a sprig of parsley that allow one to see most of the white serving plate. The skit involves two college friends (one seen, one unseen) reuniting after five years. The woman Sloan portrays repeatedly asks, "How are youuuuu?" She fills in all dead time with "Soooooooo, you look wonderful. How are youuuuu? Soooooooo." This woman suddenly becomes tense when she discovers that her old friend has a girlfriend. Sloan's character mentions how happy she is with Bob several times, and shows off her ring. Trying to recover she says, "I saw an article about you... a march... oh, you weren't there, well your friend then... I hope I didn't make you feel uncomfortable."

Taking a scarf out of her hair, Sloan instantly becomes a new character. At this restaurant she orders a lentil burger, inquires about what is in the tofu surprise, but receives no information since it's a surprise. An invisible woman walks in, and there is another reunion between college friends. This time Sloan's character asks, "Are you still with her? No? You're with a guy?"

She continues with, "Just when you think you got people pegged they change, I hate that," revealing discrimination that one can face within the LGBT community.

Donning a shawl and a lacy head covering, Sloan became a Jewish grandmother. Grandma mentioned that she didn't understand the New Country, she said, "In the Old Country, we'd go in to eat, and out to crap, and in the New Country we go in to crap and out to eat."

Things become more serious when her granddaughter comes out to her. Grandma says, "That's good, you have a roommate." The audience chuckles, assuming Grandma does not understand the girlfriend-girlfriend relationship. But Grandma makes it clear that she understands, and can relate to the granddaughter's words, "I don't need everyone to like me, all I ask for is a little respect, a little dignity to live my life." Grandma is even working at having her son speak to his daughter again, mentioning, "She's with a nice Jewish girl, a doctor..."

Sloan's next character was Merrill, the eyeglass-wearing, nasal-speaking leader of a women's group. She asked, if when a man and a woman are splitting a bill, does that mean the man pays 60 percent while the woman pays 40 percent since the pay scales still are unequal? How about when two lesbians split a bill she wondered, do they each pay 40 percent and get a 20-percent discount?

Merrill had the crowd in stitches describing a job interview where the interviewer was not treating her appropriately. She asserted, "You are treating me this way because you don't think I have a penis, but you are wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong," wagging her finger back and forth for each "wrong." She took out a penis and put it on the desk – it work better than any resume.

Sloan completed her performance with an impressive juggling routine. During this, she told the audience about a man who came up to her and said he notice that she is a woman. "Sharp guy," Sloan noted. Even though she was juggling right in front of him he asked, "Can you really juggle?" He found it easier to believe that her juggling was some sort of illusion rather than believing that a woman was really juggling.

Survivors give testimonies

On April 15, the University of Massachusetts hosted the Action for Campus Transformation (ACT) Conference. The conference registration started at 8 a.m., and after participants registered, they could also attend a GLBT resource fair that took place in the Student Union.

The actual conference started at 10 p.m. with several opening speakers in Mahar Auditorium. The first person to speak was Alex Cole, a high school student who serves on the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth. Cole explained that the commission awarded 28 grants during the current school year to Massachusetts' colleges, which is the largest number of grants ever given. He encouraged all colleges in the state to apply for a grant. He also encouraged college GLBT groups to mentor Gay/Straight Alliances in the state. Cole said, "My GSA saved my life." Cole also mentioned the upcoming Youth Pride March in Boston on May 20 and encouraged college students to attend.

UMass Chancellor David K. Scott was also one of the opening speakers at the conference. He congratulated the organizers of the conference. Scott talked about the steps to transformation of campuses and how UMass could be transformed to be a more friendly GLBT environment. Scott said that the first step to transformation, "open doors," began when the Stonewall Center opened at UMass 15 years ago. He said that it is "a model for campuses around the nation." He also spoke about the second step to transformation, "open minds," noting that "there are still closed minds (at UMass), and the third step, "open systems."

Following Chancellor Scott was Claire Higgins, the mayor of Northampton. She talked about her town, saying "Northampton is a great place for people to live... especially GLBT people." She also talked about the changes Northampton is trying to implement, including giving domestic partner benefits to partners of town employees. Higgins said, "Change on a political level comes very slowly."

Following Higgins, Felice Yeskel, the director of the Stonewall Center did an activity called "Common Ground," asking the people assembled in Mahar questions to help them find things in common with the other conference participants. Also, Alex Beaudoin, the conference coordinator, said a few words welcoming people to the conference. Afterward, Yeskel introduced the testimony part of the conference. Several student speakers gave testimony about how hate crimes and homophobia have influenced their lives.

One of the most powerful testimonies was given by Rusmir Music, a student from Holy Cross College. Music is a native Bosnian who came to the United States four years ago. He is also openly gay at Holy Cross, which has not always been the most welcoming campus toward gay people. In October of 1999, Holy Cross celebrated Gay History Month by putting up posters on campus. However, Music explained, many of the posters were torn down or defaced. New posters were put up in Clark Dorm saying that "fags die slowly." There were also other homophobic actions taken against people who are GLBT and their allies. Music was very upset by this situation, but the college administration did nothing to alleviate his anger or fear. He said they kept making empty promises to investigate the incidents, but there was no follow-up.

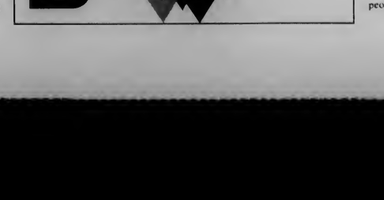
Music explained, "Coming out has strengthened me to the point where words don't hurt me anymore," but it hurt him to see his friends attacked.

Oscar Jones, a Residence Director at UMass, read a written testimony from an anonymous student at Holyoke Community College who is called "Jose" or "Josie." Josie is transgendered – she is biologically a man, but she wants to live her life as a woman. She has not found much support within her family or her college. She was rejected from her college's GLBT group because "I didn't have breasts and didn't take hormones," and this made her feel very betrayed by the gay community. She wrote that "the total lack of respect hurts me the most" when student at her school call transsexual people gross or crazy. She said "It is important for me to be myself" and that she just wants respect and freedom to be herself. She is hoping to find both of those things at UMass, where she wants to transfer next fall.

Several other testimonies were also heard during the opening ceremony. For example, junior Colleen Cooper spoke about her journey at UMass and how "homophobia eventually enveloped" many of her earlier friends. Two UMass resident assistants also spoke about the effects of residents' homophobia on their living environment.

John Kazlauskas, a junior RA said, "Silence creates and perpetuates myths and stereotypes." By breaking the silence about homophobia on campus, Kazlauskas and other students giving testimony helped participants in the conference learn about how they could achieve transformation within their schools.

Transgender workshop enlightens ACT crowd



By Jeannie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

On April 12th in the Campus Center, two transgendered people spoke on a panel for "Our Voices," the diversity series run by the Stonewall Center. The panel tried to find intersections between the GLB community and the T community. The speakers wanted to educate the audience about transgender issues.

The first speaker on the panel was Nikayo, a person who was born a female but feels like a man. Nikayo is a counseling psychology student who is working on his dissertation. Nikayo is also an African-American person, which for him creates "a combination of oppressions of race and gender." Nikayo explained, "My framework is male... Based on my (gender) assignment, people try to hang things on me that are female and they fall off. Everybody can hang both things, male and female, on their framework." People see Nikayo and make assumptions as to his gender identity and what that means. When they see Nikayo as an African-American man, they see him as dangerous. On the other hand, when people see him as an African-American woman, they don't consider her behavior appropriate because it doesn't conform to stereotypes of black women. Nikayo said, "People make assumptions and then they are mad when they learn you are not what they thought you were."

Although many people in society, especially in the black community, do not accept his gender identity, Nikayo feels happy as a transgendered person. Nikayo explained, "Right now, I'm happier than I've ever been in my life (because) I own being a man... Being transgendered allows me freedom in social transactions."

The other speaker on the panel, UMass graduate student Aaron Hans, is also a transgendered person that was born as a female but now lives as a man. He said, "I grew up a very masculine 'girl-child'... I got everyday taunts." Since he transitioned from identifying as a "dyke" to identifying as a man, some people have accused him of "buying male privilege." Now that he lives life as a man, Aaron said he has the interesting experience of seeing how different people fit into the GLBT community. Aaron explained that he sees that there is a split in the GLBT community – many GLBT people want to be mainstream and "straight," while others want to be "queer" and push the boundaries to explore new things.

Braziel lectures on the music of Joplin, Smith

By Jeannie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

On April 13, Jana Braziel, a doctoral candidate in Comparative Literature at UMass, presented a lecture entitled "Bye, Bye, Baby: Race, Bisexuality, and the Blues in the Music of Bessie Smith and Janis Joplin" in the Campus Center. Braziel's lecture was based on the paper she is writing for the Comparative Literature department.

The first part of Braziel's lecture dealt with the biographical lives of Bessie Smith and Janis Joplin. Bessie Smith was a very popular African-American blues singer in the Harlem Renaissance movement of the 1920s and the 1930s. She defied that time's conventions of heterosexuality.

Braziel said that Smith "enjoyed the pleasures of men, women... and whatever else enticed her." She was known as the "emperess of the blues... people couldn't help but notice her... Her personality was as big as a house." Following in the tradition of blues singers like Smith, Janis Joplin became a popular singer in the 1960s. She had a very tempestuous life. According to her band, Joplin was known for "sex, dope, and cheap thrills." She had liaisons with many people, including famous musicians like Jim Morrison and Kris Kristofferson. Braziel said that Joplin "created her own sexual revolution... (she was) straight with those who were straight... queer with those who were queer."

She never denied her attractions for women, but she did not want to be labeled as a lesbian because she thought it might be bad for her career, and also because she also had affairs with men.

The second part of the lecture was Braziel discussing the negative stereotypes of bisexuality. She said that in her paper, she tries to show "how bisexuality ... is performed through blues."

Braziel said that Smith and Joplin embodied many of the negative stereotypes that exist about bisexuality. For example, one of the main stereotypes about is that bisexual people are very promiscuous. Acting out this stereotype, both Smith and Joplin had affairs with hundreds of people. Both women did not accept societal notions of what was acceptable behavior for females. Braziel said that Smith was famous for her outrageous behavior and "violent, drunken bawdiness... (she regularly) told people to kiss her black ass."

Many people, including other African-Americans, regarded her as vulgar and crude. Smith also went to "buffet flats," which were apartments in the 20s where people would pas to go in to see sex shows and find sexual partners. The flats allowed women like Smith a place for their eroticism. Braziel explained that Smith and Joplin were both "spoiled identities —too both, too promiscuous, too sexual" for most people in their times.

During the lecture, Braziel also discussed something she calls "performing blacks, whites, blues and bisexuality." She explained that the blues came out of the African-American musical tradition. Working in the blues business allowed women to overcome restrictions that society put on them because they were both female and African-American. For example, touring gave female blues performers some freedom of travel. Smith, for example, bought her own railroad car so that she could have a non-segregated place to stay while she was on tour.

Finally, Braziel explained that it was difficult to write her paper because of the problems with autobiographical reading. For example, although some of Smith's song lyrics are written by her and are autobiographical, other lyrics were written by composers for her and do not necessarily reflect her own life. It is difficult for researchers to find if certain lyrics are autobiographical or not. Blues singers also often switched pronouns in songs, singing about "he" when they really were singing about a female partner. The problem with this is that it can be difficult for researchers like Braziel to find indications of bisexualities in the song lyrics of Smith and Joplin.

Sedaris rewrites stereotypes

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

David Sedaris, the author of the best-selling autobiography Naked and the only openly gay commentator for National Public Radio, spoke at Northampton's Calvin Theater on Saturday, reading excerpts from his soon-to-be-released collection of essays.

Sedaris, who has been described as "the most brilliantly witty New Yorker since Dorothy Parker," is notable not only for his sense of humor, but also for his ability to appeal to mainstream audiences without denying or censoring his sexuality.

It seems that most gay and lesbian writers cater specifically to the GLBT community with repertoires revolving around tired cliches like Judy Garland jokes and commentary about why lesbians refuse to wear dresses. The best example of this is the now-defunct Ellen, which Chastity Bono was absolutely correct in lambasting as "too gay." After the much-hyped coming-out episode, Ellen DeGeneres relied on homosexuality as the sole source of her jokes. Who, straight or gay, could possibly be interested in watching Ellen hold her first lesbian party or envision a world in which everyone else was also a homosexual? As Elton John put it, "Okay, so you're gay. Now shut up and be funny."

Such a complaint could never be made of Sedaris. His accounts of his impossibly bizarre life never could bring a smile to the face of Jesse Helms, yet he never seeks to silence his unmistakably gay sensibility.

Sedaris began his show at the Calvin with a selection from his upcoming book entitled Me Talk Pretty Someday, describing his stint teaching a college writing seminar.

"The pay was pitiful," said Sedaris, "but this meant that I got to wear a tie and be called Mr. Sedaris. I alone would get to decide whether the door would be open or closed."

His delusions of authority and respect quickly faded, and he eventually used class time to let his students watch "One Life to Live" and write assignments predicting what would happen during the next episode. Eventually a disgruntled student asked him what qualified him to judge their writing, an inquiry that left him dumbstruck. He finally responded, "I'm the only person that's paid to be in this room."

Another chapter of Me Talk Pretty Someday read by Sedaris detailed an experience on a French subway, where two American tourists, assuming he was a non-English speaking Frenchman, openly discussed his body odor at length, calling him "Froggie" and wondering when he was going to pick their pockets.

Despite these embarrassments, Sedaris said that he didn't consider the experience his worst on a subway. He explained how his sister Amy (who, incidentally, plays Gerri Blank on Comedy Central's "Strangers With Candy") called goodbye to him as she left a subway train, prompting all of the passengers to look in his direction. She then shouted out, "I hope you beat that rape charge!"

At the conclusion of his appearance, Sedaris fielded questions from the audience. When asked why he chose to be a writer, he responded, "Because I failed at everything else."

Bush welcomes gays

By T. Christian Miller and Mark Z. Barabak
Los Angeles Times

After months of shying away, George W. Bush met Thursday with a group of gay Republicans and afterward said he would not ban gays from serving in a Bush administration.

Surrounded by nearly a dozen gay activists, handpicked for the occasion, the Texas governor said that sexual orientation was "not a factor" when it came to his hiring decisions – a more conciliatory stance than he took during the GOP presidential nominating fight.

"I welcome gay Americans into my campaign. I've always welcomed gay Americans into my campaign," Bush told reporters after the hourlong session at his Austin campaign headquarters. "I hope Republicans, conservative Republicans, understand that we judge people based upon their heart and soul."

On a day in which he also announced plans to meet next month with vanquished rival John McCain, Bush sounded a distinctly harmonious note. He said he was "a better person" for having heard activists share their life stories. Even so, he emphasized his continued disagreement with activists on matters such as gay marriage.

"These are people from our neighborhoods, people with whom all of us went to school," Bush said. "I appreciate them sharing their stories with me. I'm mindful that we're all God's children."

For the many kind words, however, the gathering occurred only after several weeks of bitter back-and-forth between the Bush campaign and the gay Republican group that first requested the meeting. Ultimately, leaders of the organization, the Log Cabin Republicans, were excluded from the session.

Creed takes Mullins Higher

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

I've been a Creed fan for over three years. However, being a fan does not mean that you know absolutely everything about a certain band. I learned something Saturday night. Apparently Creed likes fire. In a show dominated by amazing pyrotechnic stunts Creed emerged among the crowd of thousands to enchant a sold-out Mullins Center. Everything that Creed stands for was represented during the hour and a half when they owned the stage. Though the band only has two albums under their belt, they played like a group that has not only been together forever, but they also created an atmosphere that made it seem like people have known who they are for much more than three short years.

After an excellent introduction to the show by UPO and Sevendust, Creed approached the stage accompanied by a backdrop of the roar of the stage and an enormous string of fire that shot straight to the ceiling. Because of its proximity to the stage, I immediately felt the effects of the fire and began to get a bit warmer. The fire was certainly a symbol of the heat the band was about to bring forth. They opened with "Ode," one of the harder songs from their debut album My Own Prison.

The debut disc was about as heavily represented as their second album Human Clay since the primary purpose of the entire tour was to promote the new album, which has sold a tremendous amount of copies, there was a very serious concentration on the songs that were selected from it. After "Ode," Creed played the first track on both albums. First was "Torn," a huge radio hit from My Own Prison, and next was "Are You Ready," a song that has huge radio potential from Human Clay. The many songs that were selected from Human Clay included, "Beautiful," "Say I and Faceless Man."

Lead singer Scott Stapp was certainly extremely proud to tell the crowd that his newborn baby boy, Jagger, was in the house. Stapp announced that when he was on the road, away from his child, the only thing that made him feel a little bit closer to his son was when he played the song that he wrote for him before he was born. He then dedicated Saturday's performance of "With Arms Wide Open," also from Human Clay, to Jagger.

The hits were certainly not missing from Creed's set list. They were sure to play "What If," from the Scream 3 soundtrack and Human Clay, as well as "What's this Life For," "Unforgiven," and the outstanding song that started all of their success, the title track from My Own Prison.

The show ended with an encore that did not let the momentum die. The band opened with "One," the song that was announced as Billboard Magazine's number one played modern rock song of 1999. They closed the show with "Higher," the first single from Human Clay.

The show certainly had infinite amounts of high points with virtually no flaws at all. One of the most noticeable changes from an average concert was the 20-foot-long catwalk that extended from the stage directly into the middle of the sea of Creed fanatics. One of the reasons why this may be so easy to pull off is because both the lead singer of Creed and Sevendust do not play any instruments. They walk around the stage for the entire duration of the show with microphones in hand. The catwalk just gives them a further place to travel. The crowd on the floor seemed to love the idea.

The band is very careful to make sure that the sound created completely mimics what is on the albums. Unlike many bands, Creed does not try to change anything in concert. They stick with what made them famous. One of the only deviations that they have from the perfected sound is when Stapp decides that the crowd should be included in the music. During some of the bigger hits such as "What's This Life For," and "What If," he stops singing and lets the fans take over. Also, the band's heavy Christian beliefs prevent them from using any profanities in their songs, so the show certainly comes off as wholesome and meaningful.

Creed certainly impressed everyone that was fortunate enough to attend the show. A person that I spoke to in the parking lot proclaimed that aside from the numerous Dave Matthews Band performances he has attended, it was the best show he has ever seen. Another UMass student said that the first question he asked himself when the show ended was, "Where and when can I see them again?"

Sevendust enlivened the Mullins Center crowd with a sparse but spirited 45-minute set featuring material from both their self-titled debut album as well as last year's follow-up, Home. The set wasn't crammed, which allowed for a crazy guitar feedback solo that proved as an intro to the excellent "Black," as well as plenty of gratitude shown by lead singer Lajon Witherspoon for the crowd's energy. "Denial," the first single from Home, got their set off to a rousing start, and crowd favorites like "Waffle" and "Rumble Fish" inspired quite a lot of movement and more than one pit on the floor. By the time "Bitch" brought things to a close, Witherspoon had the crowd in his hands, and was sure to give back all the love he received and more with an uplifting call and response.

Before Sevendust hit the stage, UPO warmed things up. The virtually unheard of band was quite impressive. Though someone did tell me that he thought the lead singer looked like Jim Bruer doing an impression of Alanis Morrissette, UPO announced that they had a debut album ready to be released in May, and played the first single, "Godless," which they claim has had some radio airplay. The song proved to be excellent, but sparked a question in my mind about why a band whose first single is called "Godless" is touring with Creed. That would be like another opening band saying, "Thanks for having us, Rage Against the Machine is up next, but we'd like to close with a very personal song called, 'Dear American Government That We Love So Much, Please Censor Us!" It simply didn't make much sense. I wonder how much Creed truly approves of UPO.

After a tremendous display of pyrotechnics and an even more tremendous performance of great music, I was left with a feeling of desiring more. I truly would love to see Creed again because I agree with the gentleman who said it was one of the best shows he has ever seen. Though the search seems fruitless at this point, because Creed has no upcoming dates announced in the area, I should simply sit back and feel fortunate that I had the privilege of attending the absolute best show that the Mullins Center has put on in a long time.

Life of Stuart compelling but very confusing

By Anna Faktorovich
Collegian Staff

"What, what, what, what, what, what, what, what, what, what?"

These are a few of the words that you might not only have heard the performer say, but might very well likely have heard in your mind last Friday after a first glance of Mary Stuart, a solo performance by Stoklos, that took place in the Bowker Auditorium. But if you stared closer and closer at this piece, more and more of the world could have opened up through it.

Stoklos used her whole body to express the emotions of Mary Stuart and Queen Elizabeth while she played both the oppressor and the oppressed in the show. By the whole body, I truly mean the whole body, her toes were just as active in portraying the character as the rest of her.

The physical movements were accompanied by Stoklos' voice. Through Stoklos voice the history of Mary Stuart's and Elizabeth lives were told. Other sounds in the performance were the music that played occasionally out of a mysterious unseen source in the stage. Through the music the emotion and symbolism of the performance were reflected.

The third element in the performance was light. Light was used to make the boundaries of the prison walls that Stoklos, as Mary Stuart, visualized for the viewer as she pushed against air as if there was a stone wall there. Light was glowing brightly and all over the stage when the vivacious Elizabeth hopped out. When the light went out Stoklos either transcended to a different time period or became a different character. Stoklos once even became the character of Nelson Mandela when she said, "My name is the name of any prisoner."

The story line behind the acting was extremely dramatic. Mary is remembering being raped, her suitor stabbed fifty times in front of her, and giving birth in prison. She is also remembering her mother who "seldom walked, she ran with her neck extended ahead of her – that neck was cut off with an axe, and fell into a basket. I don't like looking inside baskets: I feel like there will be looking right at me my mother's head," says Mary Stuart during the performance.

Then after many years in prison, her final trial where she was condemned to death is shown as an unjust one as Mary exclaims, "They did not allow me a chair – I will stand. They did not allow me a lawyer – I will defend myself."

She defends herself by saying that she is a Queen and a foreigner and hence her social, political and economical laws are different than theirs. Further, she claims that she never participated in an attempt to overthrow Elizabeth from her crown. Her argument fails and she dies without being recognized, without dignity and without respect.

On the other hand, Elizabeth is also faced with a traumatic situation. There is nobody to free her from her "executionist duties," that she must perform as a monarch. She is in the role of the oppressor; she does not want to kill her cousin but she does not want to lose the throne either. In the end, the conflict between the two is resolved with Mary's death. But the conflict between the oppressor and the oppressed is assumed to be universal and endless.

Now that said, I must say that this piece was very hard to follow just by itself. To get the above information, I read Mary Stuart's history online along with several brochures about the show. Then I stayed after to hear Stoklos explanation of her own performance and asked several theater majors and other people who looked like they had a clue what in the world happened in the play. Without that background I probably would be lost in the heavy symbolism and extreme convoluted movements that the artist performed. As one art major said after the show, "I found it pretty confusing, and I couldn't really follow the plot. I actually fell asleep."

Furthermore, some parts of the play were in Portuguese. "I had a totally different experience then the rest of the audience did," said a Portuguese There was also the dreadfully annoying repetition that was mentioned in the beginning of this piece.

Over all, the performance was, in the words of the artist herself, "condensed energy that breaks our rationality." I can't speak for other viewers, but for me, rationality was certainly broken as I watched this piece and was thrust in the world of chaos where there were no time or spatial boundaries. However, beyond the chaos is a brilliant essentialist technique and a universal struggle to be freed from oppression.

The Faith is funny

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Keeping the Faith
directed by Edward Norton with Ben Stiller, Jenna Elfman, Edward Norton playing at Mountain Farms, Hadley

Romantic comedies have always enjoyed immense popularity. They are the quintessential date movie: simple, humorous, emotionally satisfying stories which reassure us that love will always prevail. They make us feel swell.

Is feeling swell truly enough, though? Keeping the Faith may be the latest wagon in the romantic comedy train, but considering the talent involved (Ben Stiller, Jenna Elfman, Edward Norton), one should be able to expect a little more than the average date flick. And in many ways, it delivers more than the average date flick – in some ways considerably more. At every corner, however, the movie insists on defining itself by its genre; it never finds the courage to be anything but a romantic comedy, and so stuffs a perfectly fine story with the shallow trappings of light-heartedness in the name of marketability. The result leaves you thrilled and annoyed in turns.

Stiller and Norton play Rabbi Jacob Schram and Father Brian Finn, best friends since grade school and popular with the local congregations of their respective religions. As 13 year-olds, they were inseparable friends with a girl named Anna Reilly (Elfman), but Anna had to move when her father got a new job and the boys didn't hear from her for the better part of 20 years. Out of the blue, Anna returns as a professionally successful and motivated (and more than a little attractive) woman interested in catching up on old times.

The result is a love triangle of sorts in which old friendships and loyalties are threatened by Jacob and Brian's rekindled attachment to Anna, and the emotional dynamic among the three characters drives most of the movie.

Accompanying that dynamic is the problem of religion: Brian, as a Catholic priest, has obviously taken vows of chastity that complicate any feelings he might have towards Anna, and Jacob would have a hard time explaining a non-Jewish romantic interest to his congregation. Keeping the Faith deals with these issues with a commendable level of maturity and respect for the sanctity of religious institutions.

This quirky and appealing formula, however, is needlessly gummed up by shovelfuls of physical comedy and tangential humor scenes that, although reasonably funny, distract you from the story proper. A certain amount of humor is welcome and necessary in this sort of movie, but Keeping the Faith spends so much time jabbing you in the funny bone that you begin to feel manipulated.

Norton's directing doesn't help either; although generally effective, he indulges in a few too many gimmicky camera tricks and some of unbearably saccharine cheesiness jumping headfirst into nearly every romantic comedy cliche, and the movie is the worse for it.

The movie's primary salvation is its cast. Ben Stiller proves again that he was born to play the romantic/comedic lead, and Norton manages to give his normally wry comedic style an appropriately sincere edge. Jenna Elfman radiates charisma and charm despite the somewhat underdeveloped nature of her character, and runs convincingly through an impressive range of emotions.

Ben Stiller and director Edward Norton make Keeping the Faith a sure bet.

At its core, Keeping the Faith is an excellent film whose only fault is its own fear of coming up short in the joke quota department. Had a select 20 minutes been cut out of the movie, and had Norton put a little more faith in the pun in the original book instead of dressing it up in inappropriate goofiness, Keeping the Faith would have been pure beginning to end. What we have, unfortunately, is a little too sweet to swallow comfortably. B-

Courage that heals: an outdoor program

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Anyone who has been through an abusive relationship knows that it helps to have people around you for comfort and to provide a nurturing atmosphere. Courage to Heal Adventure Programs creates such an environment, establishing outdoor programs where women survivors of abuse can not only build trust and self-esteem, but also interact with nature safely and in company. A benefit concert that will raise money for this great cause is being held on Thursday April 20, at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The concert will feature female vocalists Pamela Means and Lori McKenna, slam poet Alix Olson and special guest Jake Eberly. A variety of sponsors are on board to help out, including the UMass Radical Student Union, Henion Bakery, Cedar Chest, The Mercantile, Necessities/Necesidades, Springfield College, Lots For Littles and Kinko's.

South Shore Massachusetts vocalist Lori McKenna has made quite a stir as of late in the Boston music scene. Described as combining the soul of both Patty Griffin and Lucinda Williams, her heartwarming folk is sure to move UMass as it did many Boston critics. The Boston Globe placed her self-released debut CD Paper Wings & Halo on their top ten list of 1998, and Hub radio station WUMB 91.9 FM voted her the new artist of year. Add to this her two Boston Music award nominations and her impressive touring record which includes opening for Vance Gilbert and Tom Rush, and history would dictate that UMass is in for a treat tomorrow night.

Working her way from Milwaukee, Wis. to the subways of Boston to a nomination at the Boston Music Awards is folk vocalist Pamela Means. Earning numerous accolades in her native Wisconsin, including Female Vocalist of the Year 1996 and Folk Artist of the Year 1995, Means nonetheless moved east, and was greeted with a 1999 Boston Music award nomination for Outstanding New Contemporary Folk act as well as her 1999 debut performance at the Ben & Jerry's Newport Folk Festival. Means' charismatic yet intimate folk is showcased on her three independent releases on her own Whirl Records label: Seven Romans, Bone Spurs, and 1998's Cobblestones.

Anyone interested in slam poetry, recently showcased in the film Slam which was featured in this year's multicultural film festival, will no doubt be intrigued by slam poet Alix Olson as she makes an appearance at the Campus Center tomorrow night. A member of the national poetry team the Nuyoricans as well as a solo performer who has ignited the stage with celebrities such as Queen Latifah and Michael Moore, Olson has a list of accolades which includes the OutWrite National Poetry Slam Championship. Her poetry is available for sale on her book and tape Only the Starving Favor Peace, but by her own words "a lot of what I do is in the performance." UMass has the opportunity to witness her passionate display first hand.

You can relax and enjoy beautiful and captivating folk music and poetry for a better cause on Thursday night, so make sure to show your support in giving these women the courage to heal. Admission is $8 for Five College students and $12 for the General Public at the door.

Contention deep in Kentucky Derby

Field of top 10 the race's strongest in recent history

By Bill Christine
Los Angeles Times

With less than three weeks until the running of the 126th Kentucky Derby, the race is still a maze. Fusaichi Pegasus, who now has beaten the best in both California and New York, is a legitimate favorite, but to win at Churchill Downs he'll have to outrun the deepest Derby field in years.

The Derby is on May 6, and a case can be made for at least 10 of the contenders. Saturday's semifinals – the Wood Memorial at Aqueduct in New York, the Blue Grass at Keeneland in Lexington, and the Arkansas Derby at Oaklawn Park in Hot Springs – produced the three requisite winners, but also whetted the appetites of some of the runners-up.

Here's one man's opinion of the top 10:

1. Fusaichi Pegasus – He beat The Deputy, the eventual Santa Anita Derby winner, before going to New York to beat the previously undefeated Red Bullet. Handling the opposition in Kentucky includes handling the crowd of more than 100,000. Trainer Neil Drysdale is confident that his horse won't be beaten in the post parade, but there's no dry run that can be simulated to ready him for the throng.

2. The Deputy – Since losing to Fusaichi Pegasus by less than a length, this Irish-bred colt has beaten a solid field in the Santa Anita Derby. Combining Fusaichi Pegasus' size and talent with The Deputy's disposition would produce a paragon. The Deputy is as unflappable as Fusaichi Pegasus is edgy. Fire a cannon next to The Deputy and he'd yawn. Stand Fusaichi Pegasus in front of a cannon and he'd look at it for five minutes before moving out of the way.

3. Anees – The Breeders' Cup juvenile winner is winless this year, but since recovering from a bruised foot he has run two encouraging races and is eligible to improve in Louisville. His far-back running style makes a clean trip imperative in the Derby.

4. Aptitude – The future-book bet on this colt should be for the 1 1/2-mile Belmont Stakes in June, but the 1 1/4 miles at the Derby won't hurt him, either. He has chased Red Bullet and Fusaichi Pegasus home in two races at Aqueduct. Like Anees, he doesn't find his best foot until late. In a year with a stellar field, can a Derby winner be a horse whose only win was over maidens?

5. High Yield – His gritty Blue Grass win was just another remarkable race in a consistent career: 12 starts, four wins, four seconds, and three thirds. Jockey Pat Day should be able to sit slightly off the pace with him in the Derby. The question going into the race will be whether High Yield's worst outing–a sixth-place finish at Churchill Downs in November–was just an off day or a signal that isn't his kind of racetrack. Remember Skip Away? The only track that troubled him was Churchill Downs.

6. More Than Ready – He has already run 10 races at seven tracks, and his consistency is a lot like High Yield's: six wins, two seconds, one third. Like High Yield, he will do better if he can settle behind horses in the Derby.

7. Red Bullet – In the Wood, jockey Alex Solis had to place him closer than he wanted, or risk running into heavy traffic, which seems to accompany this colt in every race. The Wood was Red Bullet's first try around two turns, and he didn't seem to tire, but was still 4 1/4 lengths behind Fusaichi Pegasus at the end. Trainer Joe Orseno said Monday that Red Bullet will not run in the Kentucky Derby but is being pointed to the Preakness at Pimlico on May 20.

8. Captain Steve – Trainer Bob Baffert, winner of two of the last three Derbies, can tiptoe into this one with the low-profile Captain Steve, who has had three consecutive thirds since winning the Hollywood Futurity in December. His only race at Churchill Downs was a corker – a 5 3/4-length win around two turns in November.

9. War Chant – With Fusaichi Pegasus and War Chant, trainer Neil Drysdale is loaded with talented runners. War Chant has run only four times, and still has the bad habits of an unseasoned horse. Drysdale will add blinkers. The Derby seems to be coming up a tad too soon for this talented colt.

10. Mighty – The Louisiana Derby winner is a reliable horse anyplace but Keeneland. After the Blue Grass, he now has two sevenths to show for two starts there.

Throw out Saturday's disaster. Historically, the Blue Grass is the worst Derby barometer. Thunder Gulch and Sea Hero are other horses that bombed at Keeneland and still won the Derby.

That's the short list. More than 20 horses will probably be entered in this Derby.

The limit is 20, and with an overflow at the entry box, money earned in graded stakes determines preference. A horse that might be precluded is Wheelaway, who made a nice late run to finish third in the Blue Grass. He gets no purse credit for winning the Tampa Bay Derby, an ungraded race.

Several trainers looking for more Derby encouragement, as well as earnings, will enter horses in the Lexington Stakes at Keeneland this Saturday.

Globalize, Commendable and Rollin With Nolan are among the probables. Last year's Lexington winner, Charismatic, also won the Derby. The 1984 Lexington runner-up, Swale, won the Derby. Going from Keeneland to Churchill Downs, you just never know.

Wings look to mastermind

Coaches always keep Bowman in their thoughts

By Helene Elliott
Los Angeles Times

Los Angeles King General Manager Dave Taylor wouldn't stoop so low as to send jackhammers to tear up the street near the Detroit Red Wings' hotel and disrupt their sleep. But Taylor claimed credit Monday for ordering rain and preventing the Red Wings from enjoying their visit.

"And we got the waves to crash behind their hotel," Taylor said.

Not quite, but someone will find a way to do it someday. It's one of the mind games that surround every playoff game.

Detroit Coach Scotty Bowman, whose team took a 2-0 lead over the Kings into Monday's game at Staples Center, is a master at mind games. Two years ago, he had the visitors' locker room at Los Louis Arena painted on the eve of the playoffs, hoping the fumes would annoy the St. Louis Blues.

Bowman usually saves his best ploys for the referees. He starts working on them before the playoffs by suggesting the league must crack down on interference or some other offense, real or imagined. As the NHL's most successful coach, he commands attention and is heard at the highest levels – perhaps before the Kings' Andy Murray, a rookie NHL head coach.

"Scotty has a lot of respect, and he's earned it," Taylor said. "He's coached for 30 years. We're trying to build some respect in L.A. Andy's working on building respect for the organization.

"Does Scotty affect the referees? I can't say he does, but he's well respected."

Murray was frustrated over two decisions in Game 2. The first was what he saw as a dive by Detroit's Sergei Fedorov to draw a penalty on Mattias Norstrom. On the ensuing power play, the Kings believe Tomas Holmstrom interfered with goalie Jamie Storr, helping Nicklas Lidstrom score Detroit's seventh goal.

If Murray believes the Red Wings get the benefit of any doubts because of Bowman, he won't say so.

"I don't have to make an issue out of it because everybody else does," he said.

But Murray is aware of what he's up against.

"Everybody knows Scotty really works the league and officials and probably works the phone more than anybody," Murray said. "But he's been in the league more than anybody."

According to Murray, Bowman tried to plant another idea in referee Kerry Fraser's head Saturday.

"At the end of the game, Scotty called Kerry over and complained that I was trying to stall," Murray said. "But Kerry said, don't worry, I know you're just trying to coach a game."

Not to mention mind games.

Like everyone else at the First Union Center last Friday, NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman didn't know that Flyer forward John LeClair's apparent goal against the Buffalo Sabres had entered the net through a hole in the mesh near the left post.

"He found out when he got a phone call from (NHL operations chief) Colin Campbell, after ESPN called him," said Frank Brown, the NHL's vice president of media relations. "He couldn't have run onto the ice and waved his arms and yelled for a do-over."

Why not?

The goal should not have counted, and replays from ESPN's goal-cam make that indisputable, unlike the Stanley Cup-winning goal Dallas' Brett Hull scored last June with his left foot in the crease. The Sabres had chances to win after LeClair's goal tied it, 1-1, but the course of the game and the series might have been different had the video goal judge seen ESPN's replays quickly and nullified the goal.

"When there's millions of dollars at stake, from a business perspective, you get it right," said Gary Thorne, a play-by-play announcer for ESPN and ABC who wasn't at the Flyer-Sabre game. "More importantly, the league keeps black-and-bluing its credibility by refusing to correct its mistakes. That hurts its image and credibility."

Unfortunately for the Sabres, goalie Dominik Hasek, who often harangues officials about opponents camping in his crease, didn't complain this time. Hasek was so puzzled to see the puck behind him, he guessed his pad wasn't as close to the post as he thought. Had he complained to referees Rob Shick and Mick McGeough, the delay might have bought time for series supervisor John D'Amico and video goal judge Mike Condon to get the ESPN replay, which wasn't initially available to them.

D'Amico and Condon had access to replays from two cameras, one installed overhead by the NHL and the other by Comcast, the Flyers' TV rights holder. On those angles, the puck appeared to enter the net between Hasek's pad and the post, or off the post.

"It was conclusively a goal and not conclusively not a goal," Brown said. "There was no conclusive evidence it had not entered the net in the way countless thousands of goals have been scored in NHL playoff history. Everyone believed the normal course of action was taking place.

"At least 50 seconds of review were conducted between the scoring of the goal, the review and the faceoff that followed. It was at least several minutes of playing time before ESPN knew what it had."

Because play had resumed and video replay procedures have no provision for a goal to be reversed in such circumstances, it stood.

Will the NHL devise a rule to cover this situation?

Courage that heals: an outdoor program

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Anyone who has been through an abusive relationship knows that it helps to have people around you for comfort and to provide a nurturing atmosphere. Courage to Heal Adventure Programs creates such an environment, establishing outdoor programs where women survivors of abuse can not only build trust and self-esteem, but also interact with nature safely and in company. A benefit concert that will raise money for this great cause is being held on Thursday April 20, at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The concert will feature female vocalists Pamela Means and Lori McKenna, slam poet Alix Olson and special guest Jake Eberly. A variety of sponsors are on board to help out, including the UMass Radical Student Union, Henion Bakery, Cedar Chest, The Mercantile, Necessities/Necesidades, Springfield College, Lots For Littles and Kinko's.

South Shore Massachusetts vocalist Lori McKenna has made quite a stir as of late in the Boston music scene. Described as combining traits of both Patty Griffin and Lucinda Williams, her heartwarming folk is sure to move UMass as it did many Boston critics. The Boston Globe placed her self-released debut CD Paper Wings & Halo on their top ten list of 1998, and Hub radio station WUMB 91.9 FM voted her the new artist of year. Add to this her two Boston Music award nominations and her impressive touring record which includes opening for Vance Gilbert and Tom Rush, and history would dictate that UMass is in for a treat tomorrow night.

Working her way from Milwaukee, Wis. to the subways of Boston to a nomination at the Boston Music awards is folk vocalist Pamela Means. Earning numerous accolades in her native Wisconsin, including Female Vocalist of the Year 1996 and Folk Artist of the Year 1995, Means nonetheless moved east, and was greeted with a 1999 Boston Music award nomination for Outstanding New Contemporary Folk act as well as her 1999 debut performance at the Ben & Jerry's Newport Folk Festival. Means' charismatic yet intimate folk is showcased on her three independent releases on her own Whirl Records label: Seven Romans, Bone Spurs, and 1998's Cobblestones.

Anyone interested in slam poetry, recently showcased in the film Slam which was featured in this year's multicultural film festival, will no doubt be intrigued by slam poet Alix Olson as she makes an appearance at the Campus Center tomorrow night. A member of the national poetry team the Nuyoricans as well as a solo performer who has ignited the stage with celebrities such as Queen Latifah and Michael Moore, Olson has a list of accolades which includes the OutWrite National Poetry Slam Championship. Her poetry is available for sale on her book and tape Only the Starving Favor Peace, but by her own words "a lot of what I do is in the performance." UMass has the opportunity to witness her passionate display first hand.

You can relax and enjoy beautiful and captivating folk music and poetry for a better cause on Thursday night, so make sure to show your support in giving these women the courage to heal. Admission is $8 for Five College students and $12 for the General Public at the door.

Contention deep in Kentucky Derby

Field of top 10 the race's strongest in recent history

By Bill Christine
Los Angeles Times

With less than three weeks until the running of the 126th Kentucky Derby, the race is still a maze. Fusaichi Pegasus, who now has beaten the best in both California and New York, is a legitimate favorite, but to win at Churchill Downs he'll have to outrun the deepest Derby field in years.

The Derby is on May 6, and a case can be made for at least 10 of the contenders. Saturday's semifinals – the Wood Memorial at Aqueduct in New York, the Blue Grass at Keeneland in Lexington, and the Arkansas Derby at Oaklawn Park in Hot Springs – produced the three requisite winners, but also whetted the appetites of some of the runners-up.

Here's one man's opinion of the top 10:

1. Fusaichi Pegasus – He beat The Deputy, the eventual Santa Anita Derby winner, before going to New York to beat the previously undefeated Red Bullet. Handling the opposition in Kentucky includes handling the crowd of more than 100,000. Trainer Neil Drysdale is confident that his horse won't be beaten in the post parade, but there's no dry run that can be simulated to ready him for the throng.

2. The Deputy – Since losing to Fusaichi Pegasus by less than a length, this Irish-bred colt has beaten a solid field in the Santa Anita Derby. Combining Fusaichi Pegasus' size and talent with The Deputy's disposition would produce a paragon. The Deputy is as unflappable as Fusaichi Pegasus is edgy. Fire a cannon next to The Deputy and he'd yawn. Stand Fusaichi Pegasus in front of a cannon and he'd look at it for five minutes before moving out of the way.

3. Anees – The Breeders' Cup Juvenile winner is winless this year, but since recovering from a bruised foot he has run two encouraging races and is eligible to improve in Louisville. His far-back running style makes a clean trip imperative in the Derby.

4. Aptitude – The future-book bet on this colt should be for the 1 1/2-mile Belmont Stakes in June, but the 1 1/4 miles at the Derby won't hurt him, either. He has chased Red Bullet and Fusaichi Pegasus home in two races at Aqueduct. Like Anees, he doesn't find his best foot until late. In a year with a stellar field, can a Derby winner be a horse whose only win was over maidens?

5. High Yield – His gritty Blue Grass win was just another remarkable race in a consistent career: 12 starts, four wins, four seconds, and three thirds. Jockey Pat Day should be able to sit slightly off the pace with him in the Derby. The question going into the race will be whether High Yield's worst outing–a sixth-place finish at Churchill Downs in November–was just an off day or a signal that that isn't his kind of racetrack. Remember Skip Away? The only track that troubled him was Churchill Downs.

6. More Than Ready – He has already run 10 races at seven tracks, and his consistency is a lot like High Yield's: six wins, two seconds, one third. Like High Yield, he will do better if he can settle behind horses in the Derby.

7. Red Bullet – In the Wood, jockey Alex Solis had to place him closer than he wanted, or risk running into heavy traffic, which seems to accompany this colt in every race. The Wood was Red Bullet's first try around two turns, and he didn't seem to tire, but was still 4 1/4 lengths behind Fusaichi Pegasus at the end. Trainer Joe Orseno said Monday that Red Bullet will not run in the Kentucky Derby but is being pointed to the Preakness at Pimlico on May 20.

8. Captain Steve – Trainer Bob Baffert, winner of two of the last three Derbies, can tiptoe into this one with the low-profile Captain Steve, who has had three consecutive thirds since winning the Hollywood Futurity in December. His only race at Churchill Downs was a corker – a 5 3/4-length win around two turns in November.

9. War Chant – With Fusaichi Pegasus and War Chant, trainer Neil Drysdale is loaded with talented runners. War Chant has run only four times, and still has the bad habits of an unseasoned horse. Drysdale will add blinkers. The Derby seems to be coming up a tad too soon for this talented colt.

10. Mighty – The Louisiana Derby winner is a reliable horse anyplace but Keeneland. After the Blue Grass, he now has two sevenths to show for two starts there.

Throw out Saturday's disaster. Historically, the Blue Grass is the worst Derby barometer. Thunder Gulch and Sea Hero are other horses that bombed at Keeneland and still won the Derby.

That's the short list. More than 20 horses will probably be entered in this Derby.

The limit is 20, and with an overflow at the entry box, money earned in graded stakes determines preference. A horse that might be precluded is Wheelaway, who made a nice late run to finish third in the Blue Grass. He gets no purse credit for winning the Tampa Bay Derby, an ungraded race.

Several trainers looking for more Derby encouragement, as well as earnings, will enter horses in the Lexington Stakes at Keeneland this Saturday.

Globalize, Commendable and Rollin With Nolan are among the probables. Last year's Lexington winner, Charismatic, also won the Derby. The 1984 Lexington runner-up, Swale, won the Derby. Going from Keeneland to Churchill Downs, you just never know.

Wings look to mastermind

Coaches always keep Bowman in their thoughts

By Helene Elliott
Los Angeles Times

Los Angeles King General Manager Dave Taylor wouldn't stoop so low as to send jackhammers to tear up the street near the Detroit Red Wings' hotel and disrupt their sleep. But Taylor claimed credit Monday for ordering rain and preventing the Red Wings from enjoying their visit.

"And we got the waves to crash behind their hotel," Taylor said.

Not quite, but someone will find a way to do it someday. It's one of the mind games that surround every playoff game.

Detroit Coach Scotty Bowman, whose team took a 2-0 lead over the Kings into Monday's game at Staples Center, is a master at mind games. Two years ago, he had the visitors' locker room at Joe Louis Arena painted on the eve of the playoffs, hoping the fumes would annoy the St. Louis Blues.

Bowman usually saves his best ploys for the referees. He starts working on them before the playoffs by suggesting the league must crack down on interference or some other offense, real or imagined. As the NHL's most successful coach, he commands attention and is heard at the highest levels – perhaps before the Kings' Andy Murray, a rookie NHL head coach.

"Scotty has a lot of respect, and he's earned it," Taylor said. "He's coached for 30 years. We're trying to build some respect in L.A. Andy's working on building respect for the organization.

"Does Scotty affect the referees? I can't say he does, but he's well respected."

Murray was frustrated over two decisions in Game 2. The first was what he saw as a dive by Detroit's Sergei Fedorov to draw a penalty on Mattias Norstrom. On the ensuing power play, the Kings believe Tomas Holmstrom interfered with goalie Jamie Storr, helping Nicklas Lidstrom score Detroit's seventh goal.

If Murray believes the Red Wings get the benefit of any doubts because of Bowman, he won't say so.

"I don't have to make an issue out of it because everybody else does," he said.

But Murray is aware of what he's up against.

"Everybody knows Scotty really works the league and officials and probably works the phone more than anybody," Murray said. "But he's been in the league more than anybody."

According to Murray, Bowman tried to plant another idea in referee Kerry Fraser's head Saturday.

"At the end of the game, Scotty called Kerry over and complained that I was trying to stall," Murray said. "But Kerry said, 'don't worry, I know you're just trying to coach a game.'"

Not to mention mind games.

Like everyone else at the First Union Center last Friday, NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman didn't know that Flyer forward John LeClair's apparent goal against the Buffalo Sabres had entered the net through a hole in the mesh near the left post.

"He found out when he got a phone call from (NHL operations chief) Colin Campbell, after ESPN called him," said Frank Brown, the NHL's vice president of media relations. "He couldn't have run onto the ice and waved his arms and yelled for a do-over."

Why not?

The goal should not have counted, and replays from ESPN's goal-cam make that indisputable, unlike the Stanley Cup-winning goal Dallas' Brett Hull scored last June with his left foot in the crease. The Sabres had chances to win after LeClair's goal tied it, 1-1, but the course of the game and the series might have been different had the video goal judge seen ESPN's replays quickly and nullified the goal.

"When there's millions of dollars at stake, from a business perspective, you get it right," said Gary Thorne, a play-by-play announcer for ESPN and ABC who wasn't at the Flyer-Sabre game. "More importantly, the league keeps black-and-bluing its credibility by refusing to correct its mistakes. That hurts its image and credibility."

Unfortunately for the Sabres, goalie Dominik Hasek, who often harangues officials about opponents camping in his crease, didn't complain this time. Hasek was so puzzled to see the puck behind him, he guessed his pad wasn't as close to the post as he thought. Had he complained to referees Rob Shick and Mick McGeough, the delay might have bought time for series supervisor John D'Amico and video goal judge Mike Condon to get the ESPN replay, which wasn't initially available to them.

D'Amico and Condon had access to replays from two cameras, one installed overhead by the NHL and the other by Comcast, the Flyers' TV rights holder. On those angles, the puck appeared to enter the net between Hasek's pad and the post, or off the post.

"It was conclusively a goal and not conclusively not a goal," Brown said. "There was no conclusive evidence it had not entered the net in the way countless thousands of goals have been scored in NHL playoff history. Everyone believed the normal course of action was taking place. . .

"At least 50 seconds of review were conducted between the scoring of the goal, the review and the faceoff that followed. It was at least several minutes of playing time before ESPN knew what it had."

Because plays had resumed and video replay procedures have no provision for a goal to be reversed in such circumstances, it stood.

Will the NHL devise a rule to cover this situation?

O'Neal wouldn't mind defending this award

By Tim Kawakami
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Shaquille O'Neal, whose defense has picked up dramatically this season, has been getting some mention as a potential defensive player of the year but both O'Neal and Coach Phil Jackson said other centers still might have the edge in that department.

"Probably guys like Dikembe (Mutombo) and Alonzo (Mourning)," O'Neal said after Monday's team meeting before the afternoon flight to Dallas. "See, that's all they do.

"Well, Alonzo picked up his scoring. But Dikembe all he does is that running BS hook, and he gets defensive rebounds. That's all he does.

"I do everything."

Was he hoping to get the award?

"I would like that," said O'Neal, whose 3.05 blocked-shot average ranks behind those of Mutombo, Mourning and Philadelphia's Theo Ratliff. "I've been playing pretty good defense, but I'd still like to pick it up a notch. And usually at playoff time I pick up my game."

Jackson said O'Neal's "remarkable" improvement on defense-especially on screen-roll plays – has been one of the keys to the team's success this season, but said it would hard for anybody who does as many things as O'Neal to also be the best defensive player in the league.

"Right now, there's about three or four other centers in the league that are above and beyond Shaquille," Jackson said. "What he can give, with his direction scoring-wise, of course, no one can touch in this league except (Tim) Duncan as a post-up player.

"But defensively, Shaquille's not quite yet in the level with the Mournings and the Mutombos, David Robinson."

O'Neal said his recent eight-day break to rest a sore ankle recharged him for the playoffs.

"Oh, I'm good," O'Neal said. "I should be good to go for the next two games and then into the playoffs – 15 to 20, however many games we've got."

from Hupp and Grogan set the tempo for UMass second shutout of the season. Sophomore Montana native Megan Thompson, who had piled up four saves backing up keeper Dana Sinkwich in game one of the tourney, again provided sweet relief for the Maroon and White with two goals from the field and two more stops between the pipes.

"Megan seemed like she was everywhere in the pool," Hupp said. "As soon as she hit the water, she stood out as a ball of energy."

Another noteworthy performance came from freshman Mattie Newell who fought through illness to notch three goals on the day.

"Mattie was really sick – coughing, and with a fever. But she played really well when she was in the water," Hupp said.

The Minutewomen's mastery of the Engineers set the stage for another war with the Crimson in the fourth match-up between the teams this year. But unlike the three previous meetings, Harvard was able to stay within striking distance of UMass and push the defending champs for the entire contest.

"Harvard came out a lot more aggressively this time," Hupp said. "We played them very well, but they also played a great game. You could tell that they really wanted to win."

Grogan agreed. "It felt like at any given second, the roles in that game could reverse," said the California native. "We really had to keep our guard up."

Hupp got UMass going by opening the scoring early in the first quarter. A second score from Hupp early in the third quarter extended the lead to 4-1 and seemed to swing momentum in the Maroon and White's direction. But an immediate answer from the Engineers kept the heat on the Minutewomen. Only after senior co-captain Claudia Clement socked home her third goal of the weekend to close the scoring at 6-2 did UMass have a chance to catch its collective breath.

Sinkwich put forth a truly dominant display in the cage for the Minutewomen, stopping a 4-meter penalty shot on her way to a 10-save performance. Senior Laurie Edwards scored once to run her tourney tally to three scores.

The team will now prepare for the next tier in its quest for glory – the Eastern Championships, slated for April 29-30 in Princeton.

Same 'ole story: Pats blow draft chance, Jets pick well

MANHATTAN, N.Y. – I hate the New York Jets. Being a fan of the New England Patriots It is likely that I would despise a team that plays its games in the most disgusting state in the world (New Jersey). As if that was not bad enough, it is not even the state that they name themselves for. More than that, they have to play in a stadium that they share with the New York Giants.

I hate the fact that the Patriots give their good players to their division rival. What I hate the most is that New England gave up on their season when they traded their first round draft pick to get lets assistant coach Bill Belichick. We gave up a quality running back for a coach that has had trouble winning. So he beat New England in the playoffs in 1994. I do not care. All I want is a Super Bowl. And we cannot do that without a running back.

Critics sat that getting J.R. Redmond in the third round was a steal, but look back to last year when we drafted Kevin Faulk in the second round. Oh yeah, let us not forget that Robert Edwards guy that we got in the first round in 1998 and subsequently rushed for 1,000 yards and then proceeded to tear every part of his knee in a beach football game.

The arm of Drew Bledsoe and the hands of Terry Glenn are just not going to win games in the AFC East anymore. As the rest of the division seems to get stronger every year, the Patriots seem to be going in a downward spiral. The offensive line is depleted and has Bledsoe scrambling for his life on every snap. We all know that he is not the fleetest of foot. Not to mention that we just lost Shawn Jefferson to the Falcons and released Ben Coates. These two have been fixtures in the huddle since the title run in 1996, and now will move on to become better players, as most that leave New England do.

I can appreciate losing players to free agency. But when you lose Curtis Martin, Tom Tupa, Keith Byers and Otis Smith to our rival, it just is not fair.

And I can draw this conclusion because I was at the NFL Draft on Saturday. A draft that the Jets had four first round draft picks. With these picks that Shaun Ellis, a defensive lineman from Tennessee at No. 12; John Abraham, a linebacker from South Carolina with No. 13; Heisman Trophy finalist Chad Pennington, a quarterback from Marshall at No. 18; and Anthony Becht, a tight end from West Virginia at No. 27.

Granted, in order top get two of these picks they had to give up All-Pro wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers But they knew they needed to make some moves and they did what they had to do. They are making a commitment to keep the newly re-found winning tradition going, even without the tuna at the helm. On the other hand, the Patriots look like they want to return to the days of Marion Butts, Tommie Hodson and Dick MacPherson. Actually, come to think of it, those teams were less confusing than today's Patriots are.

Owner Bob Kraft has made one good move in the last two years, not moving the Patriots to Hartford. However, in the last couple of seasons, the Patriots moves in the standings are similar to the direction they would have gone if they moved to Hartford... down south. Now it is time to move back up in the standings, and that will start when the team does not start giving up first round picks for a coach whose best nine letters in his coaching career are F-I-R-E-D and I-I-A-R.

Even though the Jets history is about as successful as the Los Angeles Clippers, they have one thing that every Patriot fan wants, a Super Bowl title. The Pats have made it to the big show twice and have been bombarded in both games.

What will be the next in line for the Patriots to give away? Maybe the new stadium that they have strived so hard to get. Only time will tell.

IOC sets sights on internet

By Alan Abrahamson
Los Angeles Times

LAUSANNE, Switzerland – In a revealing sign of the import of the technology and finance issues that have both nothing and everything to do with sports, the International Olympic Committee announced plans Monday to convene an Internet summit.

Amid pressure from broadcasters and others to marry the Olympic Games and the Internet, an IOC committee said Monday it plans to hold a "New Media and Sport" conference here – where the IOC is based – in November with the intent of inviting a who's who in sports and cyberspace.

"We have to find some way to get our Internet act together," said Canadian Dick Pound, an IOC vice president who for several years has negotiated its lucrative U.S. television rights contracts.

The plans were announced as the IOC's ruling Executive Board arrived for three days of meetings aimed partly at quelling persistent media reports of impending doom at this summer's Sydney Games – but mostly at more business. The IOC is due to review its accounts with dozens of international sports federations, money derived mostly from TV revenues.

Perhaps the key issue facing the IOC as it explores the Internet is that it has signed long-term TV contracts with broadcasters around the world. In the United States, for instance, NBC is paying $3.5 billion to televise the Games, Winter and Summer, from Sydney through 2008.

Audio and video from the Games would be a natural for the Internet. Each Summer Games provides more than two weeks of sports "content."

The IOC is under increasing pressure from its broadcast "partners" to include the Internet in the definition of the rights granted them. The long-term contracts are generally ambiguous on the point.

The contracts clearly, however, protect a network in one country from a network in another nation. That means, for instance, that NBC doesn't have the right to post Games audio or video on an NBC Web site unless it can guarantee those sounds or images won't leave the United States.

■ Hawks

vocabulary."

Still, St. Joe's cannot be taken lightly. The Hawk roster includes the most recent conference Rookie-of-the-Week, Shannon Hungate, who tallied 11 goals and eight assists on the week. Hungate has two teammates with over 20 points apiece: Brett Dymarczyk and Bernadette Smith.

Barnes knows Dymarczyk and Smith quite well. Dymarczyk, the A-10 Rookie-of-the-Year in field hockey, was recruited to attend UMass, and Smith was recruited by Barnes to play at Holy Cross when he was coaching there in 1996.

But after those players the Red and White scoring drops off. In comparison, the Minutewomen can look to almost its entire roster for scoring punch. This year, 19 UMass players have recorded a point, led by seniors Rebecca Minaker with 19, and Stephanie Pavlick with 20. Statistically, when Massachusetts comes to play on offense, it fares well.

"We took only 18 shots against Virginia Tech, and they took 26, and they won the game," Barnes said. "We need to take more shots, we need to drive to the cage."

Perhaps more important than the maroon diversity on offense is the maroon stinginess on defense. The defensive component of the Minutewomen includes the top goaltender in the conference, junior Jen Nardi, three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young, and All A-10 candidates Melissa Wiele, Jessica Passanese and Denise Brey.

Only New Hampshire scored more than 10 against UMass, despite a schedule that included highly ranked Syracuse, Dartmouth and Cornell. Even the Wildcats, who managed 12, found themselves on the bottom of a one-point decision on their home field.

St. Joe's might find the Minutewomen defensive unit hard to crack, having scored six points or less in six of its first eight outings.

"We're known as a defensive team," Barnes said. "What we need to do is improve on that defense, and be more consistent on offense. If we score six goals in the second half, we should score six goals in the second half."

■ marathon

Kathryn at the finish line.

Still, the Boston Marathon has become more glitz than substance over the years. It is no longer a true sporting event, but an extravaganza staged by commercial sponsors and hyperactive local media. The day after tomorrow, who is going to remember that Elijah Lagat and Catherine Ndereba captured the men's and women's titles, respectively? Who even knew in the first place?

Local interest in the marathon has waned in recent years, especially since Americans no longer pose a threat to win. The days of local marathon heroes like Johnny Kelley have long faded, and the race now consists of a handful of Ethiopians and Kenyans competing for the laurel wreaths. While there is nothing wrong with this, the local flavor that used to make the marathon so endearing to Bostonians is virtually nonexistent.

Of course, unceasing television coverage and ubiquitous commercialization add to the hype and overkill. Sponsors are eager to advertise to the thousands of out-of-towners that care more about the marathon than the locals, and corporations will stop at nothing to ingrain their brand names into people's minds. The evening prior to the marathon, Ronzoni sponsored a huge pasta dinner at Faneuil Hall. Participants had to wear corny looking Ronzoni hats in order to receive food, and Ronzoni employees dressed up as pasta boxes while they roamed around Quincy Market. Similar pre-marathon events have become the epitome of tacky.

Perhaps the saddest aspect of the Boston Marathon is the demise of the significance of Patriots Day. Now better known as "Marathon Monday," Patriots Day has been transformed into the cheesiest of holidays. The day has strayed from its original purpose, which is to honor local veterans. Instead, the holiday is consumed by the marathon and every annoying ounce of overkill it brings with it.

And that's where the Olde Towne Team comes in. The Red Sox, perennial clingers to the days of yore, prevent the city from being completely devoured by the marathon beast.

The Sox first played on the same day as the Marathon in 1902, but the tradition of playing a morning game at Fenway Park was initiated in 1968. Since then, every third Monday of April has featured an 11:05 a.m. first pitch. Often times, the managers skip batting practice altogether in order to accommodate their groggy players. While the game has its scheduling nuisances, it provides the city with a badly needed breath of fresh air during Marathon Mania.

This year, the Red Sox lent class and dignity to a weekend that severely lacked both. Prior to Sunday's game, marathon legend Johnny Kelley (winner in 1935 and 1945) threw out the ceremonial first pitch. On Monday, pre-game ceremonies included the introduction of numerous local veterans in recognition of Patriots Day. Leave it to Fenway Park, a hardball time capsule, to pick up the slack and give history its proper reverent acknowledgement.

So let the 17,741 marathoners and their rooters-on have their day of commercialized fun. The 33,240 that gathered in the old ballpark on Yawkey Way got a taste of what Patriots Day is and should be about.

As Sox fans filed out of Fenway towards Kenmore Square, many of the marathon watchers cast an annoyed glance towards the hardball crowd.

"Oh right, the baseball game," many of them muttered as the street became overcrowded with the merging masses.

That's right, the baseball game. The city's haven from the hype and hysteria that now define the Boston Marathon.

Cannella said.

"We're going to have to take a lot of shots to beat him."

There would be no better time for the Minutemen to get back on track than this home match-up as No. 5 Georgetown is slated for Saturday and No. 2 Syracuse, the following week. Both of those contests will be on the road before the Maroon and White return home for an ECAC game with Rutgers.

"It's a big game for us," Cannella said. "They're a New England rivalry.

Playing at home could prove to be a blessing in disguise for the Minutemen.

"We need to find some way to motivate your players," Cannella said. "Being here [in Amherst] all day and not having to travel should help us out."

Busy weekend for UMass varsity sport squads

Tennis teams tackle conference tourneys; track set for Storrs' dates

Men's Track and Field

For now, the long road home won't come to an end for the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team, until the season concludes. But UMass will have to show the true road warrior is inside.

The Minutemen won a few battles this weekend but lost the war, coming up short in the six-team meet at Brown University. UMass came within five points of placing third in a very tight pack, putting 95 points on the board.

Finishing first on the day were the hometown Bears of Brown University with 129 points, followed by the Rams of Rhode Island with 127.

Northeastern fell into the third slot with 100 points on the afternoon. Massachusetts finished just two points short of fourth place Southern Connecticut, which put up 97 points.

Some standout performances for the Minutemen came from the always-spectacular Vic Morency, who sat out in the javelin, but placed first in both the discus and shot put competitions. Morency looked to edge his way up the UMass record books, but came one inch shy of the discus record with his personal best throw of 181-feet, 11-inches.

Senior Ben Baraldi turned in another fantastic outing sprinting for first in the 110-meter hurdles, with a time of 14.57 seconds. That time was just one tenth of a second behind his career best performance.

The Minutemen will next be in action when they continue their long road home with another stop in Storrs, Conn., to take part in a six-team competition starting at 11 a.m.

Women's Track and Field

While the cold and windy weather on Saturday hardly made one think of the sea, a Rhode Island's star was more than happy to return home to the Ocean State.

Pawtucket native Rhianna DaCruz was one of the bright spots for the Massachusetts Women's Outdoor Track Team as it earned third-place finish at Brown Saturday.

The sophomore Minutewoman broke her own record in the pole vault, jumping to a height of 11-foot-2. The previous week at Connecticut, DaCruz had set the UMass record at 11-feet. Her vault this past Saturday was good for a second-place tie.

Senior Melissa Ward was another high point for the Maroon and White. The lone event winner for UMass, Ward leapt to first in the long jump with a distance of 17-feet, 10-inches. Rhode Island squeezed out a victory over host school Brown 167.33 to 163.67. The third-place Minutewomen garnered a score of 92.

Strong performances were also put up by senior Sharon Tillotson, who placed in the 3000 meters with a time of 10:07.83, sophomore Nelle Giffune, with her red-ribbon javelin throw of 122-feet, 3-inches, and first-year sensation Maggie Curry, hurling the discus 139-feet, 7-inches, good enough for a new career-best and fourth all-time in the UMass record books.

The Minutewomen return to action this Saturday as they travel to Storrs, Conn. to compete in a six-team meet. Opponents include Brown, Boston College, Rhode Island, Providence, and host school UConn.

Women's Tennis

Judgment day came and went this weekend in Blacksburg, Virginia for the Massachusetts women's tennis team, which lost in the and semi-final round.

Lead by senior Ola Gerasimova and sophomore Annie Hamilton – both of who were both named to the All-Conference Team (Gerasimova third straight) – the Maroon and White captured third place at the Bell Atlantic Atlantic Ten Championships.

In the opening-round game against Xavier Saturday, UMass had some luck on its side, winning a hard fought match, 4-3.

However, luck would not be on the Minutewomen's side when they faced eventual home-court champs Virginia Tech. UMass fell 5-1 to the Hokies, with Robyn Lebovitz getting the only win for the Maroon and White, 6-3, 6-4 over Kelly Smith.

In the consolation game against George Washington, Hamilton won her singles match 6-1, 7-6(5) over Sarine Weingarten and combined with Gerasimova to win the No. 1 doubles match 9-7(1). It was the best UMass game of the tournament, as the Minutewomen defeated the Colonials 5-3.

The Minutewomen finished their season with a 9-15 mark overall and a 6-10 record during the spring. This was UMass' first losing season since the program was reinstated eight years ago.

Men's Tennis

On the men's side of the net, the results were not as good. The Minutemen would only win one game before bowing out in the quarters.

The seventh-seeded Minutemen defeated tenth-seeded St. Joseph's 4-1 on a rainy Friday night that saw the scheduled start pushed back from its original time because of the weather. UMass got a solid effort from its two through five players, lead by Fabien Rahanal and Bo Navarro, both of who swept their matches 6-2, 6-3 and 6-1, 6-1 respectively.

The Maroon and White moved on to the Quarterfinals where they were outplayed and swept by Duquesne 5-0. One bright note that came out of the weekend for the Minutemen was sophomore Steve Prisco, who was named to the 2000 Atlantic 10 All-Conference Team for his stellar and consistent play all year.

The Minutemen, who are 10-10 15-10 in the spring, will next be in action when they face Stoneybrook in their final game of the year at 10:30 a.m.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You'll know what is needed today almost as soon as the need arises. This will give you an important advantage over your nearest competitor.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You've been believing your own press a little too much lately, and it's time you came back down to earth and recognized your own weaknesses.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Be pleasant and generous at all times today and you'll get exactly what you want. Don't be phony, however, someone will see through you!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Focus on hopes and dreams today, and on ways you can improve your chances of success in a difficult endeavor. Don't sell yourself short!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Friendship is likely to become a central issue before the day is out. Are you possibly doing something to put a strain on a relationship?

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – It'll be up to you today to whip yourself into shape as quickly as you can. A major challenge is fast approaching, and you must be ready.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Seek and ye shall find today – and you'll be delighted with an unexpected result! Many of your favorite expectations can be fulfilled at this time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Success today is simply a matter of doing things very much by rote, just as you have practiced. You needn't wing it at any time.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may find yourself immersed in a surprise situation that is uncomfortable, but not at all impossible. Clever action can solve all problems.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – The money may be running out in some respect today, and it's time for you to think a little more economically. Keep careful records of expenses.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – The unexpected is not to be feared today. Instead, you should enjoy the chance to show off your ability to change and adapt quickly and easily.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may be seeing things quite differently from anyone else today, and though your explanations are quite clear you may remain on your own.

UMass hits boiling point

Red-hot water polo captures New England title

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Four seniors. Four years. Four championships.

The No. 13 Massachusetts women's water polo team proved that four was indeed the luckiest of numbers this weekend, sweeping through the Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) New England Championships for its fourth consecutive tournament title.

The Maroon and White (25-6, 10-0 CWPA) annihilated Wesleyan 22-4 and MIT 10-0 Saturday to set up a Sunday showdown with host Harvard, which the Minutewomen outlasted 6-2 to lay claim to the event crown.

"This is the first of the three championship tournaments we'll play," said senior All-American Katie Grogan, referring to the team's annual ascent through New Englands and Easterns onto Nationals. "We're really playing well together as a team, peaking at the right time."

As UMass racked up eight unanswered goals in the first quarter of play, the team's tourney-opening challenge from Wesleyan failed to provide much drama for those in attendance at Blodgett Pool. Three more second-quarter scores would send the Minutewomen into halftime with an 11-1 edge, giving the team the utmost confidence in its newly designed offensive scheme.

"We used the Wesleyan game to test out some different kinds of offenses which we hadn't had a chance to try against another team," senior All-American Marci Hupp said. "Basically, they were plays designed to break the drop and open up the hole set to get more shots."

That plan worked wonders for Hupp and the team's other 2-meters, as the Ohio original dropped a hat trick on Wesleyan as part of an 11-player scoring onslaught. Teammate Megan Perry paced the Maroon and White with four goals on the game.

The semifinal match-up with MIT developed into an equally lop-sided affair, as dueling hat tricks

Huskies bite limping Minutemen

Clark, Ellerbrook not enough in loss to major rival

Senior second baseman Shaun Skeffington and his Minutemen hosted border-state rival UConn yesterday. The Huskies whipped UMass 12-5

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

The members of the Massachusetts baseball team walked off Earl Lorden Field yesterday shaking their heads.

"We need to believe in ourselves more," coach Mike Stone said. "We just need to start playing to do something positive."

It was a tough day to play. There's no doubt about that. Even from the outset, the Minutemen knew it wasn't going to be easy.

UConn	12
UMass	5

First of all, their opponent was the University of Connecticut. And secondly, the Maroon and White's best hitter was wedged inside the dugout. The result: UConn 12, UMass 5.

The Huskies (19-14) jumped out to an early lead on the Minutemen (13-14-1), scoring three runs off starter Jesse Santos in the top half of the first inning. To begin the game, leadoff batter Cy Hess reached on a fielding error before a Clarke Caudill single to short center field that would push him to second. Kevin Wisner then reached base thanks to a botched double play by second baseman Shaun Skeffington. Brian Packin singled to score Hess for the first run of the game.

Another Skeffington mishap, this time a bobble of a Michael Scott grounder, scored Caudill to give UConn a two run lead. A fielder's choice by third baseman Aaron Senez, going for the sure out instead of turning two, plated the final run of the inning.

Connecticut starting pitcher Robert Barton pitched two innings of hitless baseball before being relieved by freshman Daniel Trubia in the bottom of the third frame. Trubia walked his first foe, Gavin Clark, only to see freshman Tom Ellerbrook advance Clark 90-feet to third. The single was Ellerbrook's first hit of his collegiate career. Clark would score on a Scott Anderson ground out to short, bringing the score to 3-1.

Ellerbrook, a Northampton native, went 1-for-3 with one hit and one RBI on the day. It was his first ever start for the Minutemen, filling in for the wounded Chris Morgan.

"Even though we're in different conferences, we'll keep this going every year, home and away. You know, it's UConn/UMass; it's a good thing to do."
–UConn coach Andy Baylock

"He's a good back-up catcher right now," Stone said. "[Morgan] caught a lot of innings last weekend and he needed to rest his knee. Morgan's our guy. He's legit. He's the best hitter on the team, so we don't want to have him out of there."

From the top of the fourth inning to the bottom of the seventh, Santos and Trubia kept the score locked at 3-1. Santos, however, was finally undone by the Huskie offense at the top of the eighth when Caudill launched a two-out delivers up and over the left field fence to put the Huskies up 6-1.

UConn added six more in the ninth to put the game out of reach. The Minutemen rallied for four runs in the bottom of the ninth, but it was all for nothing.

Trubia earned the win in relief, pitching five innings while giving up just one run on five hits, striking out eight and walking two.

Santos was marked for the loss to drop his record to 2-5. He didn't, however, allow an earned run in the eight innings that he pitched. He fanned five Huskies while walking four.

"[Santos] pitched well," Stone said. "He put together a solid seven innings for us."

There is no question that UConn's performance pleased coach Andy Baylock. It was, however, the historical facet of the game that gave the Huskie skipper something extra to smile about.

"I'll tell you what I got excited about today. Tommy Ellerbrook," Baylock said. "I saw the name in the lineup and I said 'It's gotta be ...' His dad was a great player [at UConn] during the late sixties, early seventies, as a baseball player and a basketball player. And he was in the stands so I went over and said 'hello' to him."

Baylock also commented on the rivalry between the two schools.

"I've coached many, many years," he said. "Coach [Earl Lorden] was here when I started and we always said 'Even though we're in different conferences, we'll keep this going every year, home and away. You know, it's UConn/UMass; it's a good thing to do. And, a lot of the kids like it because they play summer ball together. It's a good-healthy relationship."

The Minutemen travel to Burlington, Vt. today to face Stone's former squad, the Vermont Catamounts.

Holy Lax Wars!

Minutewomen set for battle with Hawks

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

With two dominating victories to start off the Atlantic 10 schedule, followed by a tumultuous 8-6 loss at the hands of reigning conference champ and constant thorn-in-the-side Virginia Tech, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is at another crossroads in a topsy-turvy 2000 season.

After fighting through a power-house-laden non-conference itinerary to begin the year at 2-5, the Minutewomen faced a key point: the beginning of the A-10 schedule. The Maroon and White put a 50-spot on the pair of St. Bonaventure and Duquesne to overcome the challenge.

Today, against St. Joseph's at Totman Field at 3 p.m., UMass must avoid falling to .500 in the league, a mark that would put the Minutewomen in a must-win situation for nearly the rest of the conference slate, which includes Top 20 Temple on Friday at home.

The Hawks' only A-10 victory to date is a 20-3 route of the Bonnies, which, by pummeling the them, puts the Hawks in a group that is about as exclusive as the white pages.

"Even though St. Joe's schedule isn't as strong, they're traditionally a very scrappy team," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "They're going to play for a full 60 minutes. The word 'quit' is not in their

Men's lacrosse ready for No. 13 Harvard

By Bryan Smith

It has been a tough three weeks for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. The Minutemen stood at 4-2 heading into an Eastern College Athletic Conference game at Penn State. The Maroon and White fell to the host Nittany Lions by a count of 11-8.

Then disaster hit. The following week, after exploding to out of the gates to the tune of a 3-0 lead against Maryland-Baltimore County, the Minutemen once again found themselves on the ropes. With the score knotted at eight apiece, the game headed into overtime. Midway through the extra session the Retrievers would net the game-winner, and with it, dropped UMass' record to the .500 mark.

...sophomore midfielder Marc Morley and company will look to make the day miserable for Harvard across campus on the Garber Field turf.

Trying to keep their heads above water, the Minutemen traveled this past weekend to play No. 3 Loyola. The attempt to regain its winning ways would be short-lived. They battled valiantly for the first half and went into the locker room tied at five.

Then the boys in green did what Syracuse did to them a week before, when a late Orangeman surge left the Greyhounds foaming at the mouths and wondering how they could let a win escape them.

Loyola put up 10 goals in the second half while the Maroon and White could muster only five. The end result was a 21-10 defeat and with it was a midseason three-game losing streak.

"Our guys have to understand and know that they can play with any team in the country," coach Greg Cannella said of his team's first half effort against Loyola.

Today the Minutemen will look to resurrect their season as Harvard visits Garber Field. The No. 13 Crimson comes to Amherst with a 6-3 record and on the heels of a 12-6 defeat at the hands of Princeton.

"They're a very good team," Cannella said. "It will be another challenge for our guys to come and play."

Despite the three consecutive losses, the Minutemen have been scoring at will. But the problem is that the usually strong defense has allowed some goals late in quarters and has seemed to falter at crunch time.

Rich Kunkel and John Madigan continue to pace the UMass attack posting 25 and 22 points respectively. Kunkel has 18 goals and seven assists, while Madigan has dented the twine 16 times and has six helpers.

Sophomore Marc Morley is third on the team with 18 points and junior Keith Gabrielli ranks fourth with 16 points.

Harvard is led by freshman Matt Primm, junior Roger Buttles and returning All-America Jeff Psaki.

The Crimson also has a solid netminder in Keith Cynar who is coming off a 21 save performance against the Tigers.

"We saw him [Cynar] make 21 saves last week,"

Ugh... Marathon Monday

Red Sox cling to fading tradition

BOSTON – It's as Boston as baked beans, clam chow-dah, and Ted Kennedy. It's one of the Hub's well-known quirks, no less than the I-Street Brownies annual New Year's swim or the Boston Pops performance on the Fourth of July.

Every Patriots Day, runners from all corners of the globe converge upon Hopkinton, the starting point for the much hyped, internationally known Boston Marathon. And every Patriots Day, while the rest of Major League Baseball sleeps, the Boston Red Sox play host to baseball's only morning game of the season.

This year's edition of post-brook-fast hardball featured a pitchers' duel between Sox lefty Jeff Fassero and Oakland A's right-hander Olf Heredia. After escaping from a bumpy first inning, Fassero settled in for four innings of scoreless ball before giving up one costly run in the fifth. ("We dodged some musket rounds in the first inning here on Patriots Day," said Sox manager Jimy Williams, master of the quirky sound bite.)

Jen Cormier

Despite the Sox' 1-0 loss, Fenway's annual morning romp remained the sole jewel in what has become an excruciatingly over-hyped, over-commercialized holiday.

True, the 104th running of the Boston Marathon had its fair share of warm and fuzzy stories, the most notable having a distinctive Red Sox connection. Kathryn Nixon, wife of Sox outfielder Trot Nixon, huffed and puffed along the 26.2 miles in order to raise money for the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. Trot received permission from the Sox to skip the team flight to Detroit and take a later commercial flight so that he could remain in Boston to meet

Final Four just out of rugby's reach

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Sometimes you have to beat the best to be the best. The Massachusetts women's rugby team had a chance to do just that, but unfortunately fell short in its attempts to reach the Final Four in Tampa, Fla.

Sixteen teams were on the slate in the national qualifier, broken into four four-team subgroups. The Minutewomen had the vaunting task of facing the nation's only varsity rugby team in the first round, when they went head-to-head with Eastern Illinois.

The Panthers defeated the Maroon and White by a score of 15-5, ending all hopes of going to the Sunshine State. Overconfidence may have been a factor as the Minutewomen came in as the higher ranked of the two teams.

"It wasn't our best game," tight head prop Meg Connolly said. "We went in cocky. We were ranked No. 6 and they were No. 13."

EIU came out with five coaches and two trainers. The Panthers seemed to have as much help on the sideline as they did on the field.

"We don't face that kind of competition in the northeast," Connolly continued. "Cornell is ranked second in the northeast and they didn't do that well." loose head prop Shannon Wallace said.

Going into the intermission, Eastern Illinois was trailing 5-3 but came out for the second half with fire. The Panthers did not allow a single point in the second stanza and ran away with the 10-point victory.

"We would bring the ball down and not be able to score, and they would just score on the other end," Wallace said. "We were a little unlucky because of the weather [rain] and dropped a lot of balls. We just couldn't score. They wanted it more than we did and they fought us in every way."

"They were bigger and stronger than us," Stacey Lazeau said.

The second day's action saw the Minutewomen rejuvenated and subsequently stormed Clemson by a score of 42-0.

UMass scored early and often in this one and would never look back. Sarah Piccioli started the scoring onslaught by touching down the first two tries of the game. Danielle Tagg would add the next two. And before the half was over, Anne Garrison would score as well as a third from Piccioli.

The UMass forwards showed a clear advantage over their counterparts from Clemson as the Maroon and White came up with the ball on nearly every set piece.

"From the get go they really had no chance," Connolly said. "We stole all their scrums and line outs. That helped us a lot."

The second half would prove to be the same. While the UMass pack was busy pushing around the Tigers, the Maroon and White backfield went to work running all over the open field. Wallace opened the scoring with a try. Adrienne Petito would add another before Tagg scored the final two of the game.

"Our forwards completely dominated their forwards in every aspect of the game," Wallace said.

The win was the Minutewomen's third in their subgroup.

"If we played the way we played on Sunday on Saturday we would have won that game, too," Connolly said.

In the tournament the Tigers were outscored by a combined margin of 109-0 after losing their opening round game 67-0 to eventual subgroup winner Princeton.

The four teams that advanced for a chance to win a national championship were Princeton, Penn State, Illinois and Stanford.

SGA progress gives way to walkout

JANET BARRY / COLLEGIAN

The SGA held their weekly meeting last night.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) passed six motions last night, including a motion aimed at creating a statewide student association to communicate students' interests to both the University of Massachusetts administration and the state legislation.

Even with such goals as representing the student voice being heard, approximately 10 senators walked out in the middle of the meeting, causing the Senate to lose quorum and end the meeting early.

In addition, the Senate spent a total of 20 minutes debating on two instances to overrule the decision of the Speaker of the Senate Mikale Billard. At the end of the meeting, the Senators overruled both the Speaker and the Associate Speaker, Jennifer Teixera, in an attempt to keep quorum. However, they failed to meet the required number of present senators by one, and were forced to adjourn.

"This is a grave dishonor to the students for senators to leave the meeting in the middle of a motion," Billard said. "Wasting senators' time going over the motion and ending the meeting before the motion was finished is ridiculous."

The Senate spent approximately 30 minutes debating a motion proposed by Lanell James, chair of ALANA Caucus, and Sarah Hamill, secretary of Public Policy and Relations. It called for the SGA to allocate $1,721 dollars from the Finance Reserves to the SGA Campus Committee for Student Power (CCSP) to provide airfare and hotel accommodations for four student representatives traveling to Minneapolis to attend a nationwide student government conference. The aim of the conference is to gain the knowledge and skills to develop a successful unified student coalition on the UMass campus. The larger goal would be to network with other Massachusetts college campuses in order to create a new statewide Student Association of Massachusetts (SAM) with a powerful voice for addressing issues on the state and federal levels.

Hamill said that the original SAM group was organized by UMass Dartmouth but failed due to a lack of organization. She said that as a result, there is no student representative in the Massachusetts State House and student voices aren't being heard.

"We need to form a strong coalition of students on campus to communicate with the administration," Hamill said. "Start with small grassroots and then go larger to nationwide coalition to appeal to the legislation."

Hamill said it is her hope to work with Registered Student Organizations (RSO's) on campus to fund for the trip to Minneapolis. Numerous RSO's in support of the movement placed their faith in the SGA to take a leadership position and fund the conference trip, Hamill stated.

However, Senator Asif Sayani said he is against the motion to fund such a large amount of money for four individuals' hotel and airfare accommodations. He said that this amount of money could be better spent toward providing funding for events open to the entire campus and not limited to four individuals.

"I would be doing a grave injustice to myself if I were to vote for this motion," Sayani said. "This is for four students and I haven't seen any fundraising for this."

Republican Club President Michael Rossetie added that the SGA Ways and Means Committee has always funded various RSO's to put on programs every semester, and the money allocated to these groups cannot be used for airline travel and hotel accommodations.

"SGA should not be petitioning to fund itself when RSO's themselves

Tennis legend King to deliver address

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Billie Jean King, one of history's most celebrated tennis players and advocates for women's equality, will deliver the main address at the 130th Commencement of the University of Massachusetts.

The address, to be given at 10:30 a.m. on Sunday, May 21 in Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, will be attended by some 4,000 undergraduate bachelor's degree candidates.

"We are proud and pleased that she will address our seniors," said Chancellor David K. Scott. "We expect that she will be one of our most popular speakers ever. She is one of this country's best known women, best known athletes and best known champions for social change."

In 1990 Life magazine named King as one of the "100 Most Important Americans of the 20th Century." In 1972 she was named Sports Illustrated "Sports Person of the Year," the first woman to be honored. King is also a member of both the International Tennis Hall of Fame and the National Women's Hall of Fame.

In a statement issued by her publicist, King expressed her enthusiasm at being chosen to address the Class of 2000.

"I am looking forward to coming to Amherst and being part of this year's graduation ceremony," said King. "For years [UMass tennis coach] Judy Dixon has told me about the great UMass campus, and I'm glad I can come there to share in this special day."

King, 56, has for years used her fame to help shed light on matters of social importance. At a time when women existed virtually unrecognized in the world of sports, King emerged as a major voice that spoke

Faculty pair honored as Carnegie Scholars

By Virginia Avedision

Two professors from the University of Massachusetts, Jane A. Baran of communication disorders and Deirdre A. Royster of sociology, have been named Carnegie Scholars in the Pew National Fellowship Program.

The program is part of the Carnegie Academy for the Scholarship of Teaching and Learning (CASTL). The pair is among 40 faculty members chosen nationwide to participate in this year's program.

Mary Deane Sorcinelli, UMass associate provost and director of the Center for Teaching, says the national award is more than a personal achievement for Baran and Royster.

"It also speaks volumes about the quality of teaching and learning at the University," Sorcinelli said. "Both Jane and Deirdre are highly committed teachers who have sought a variety of opportunities to refine and enhance their own teaching. I'm certain that their ability to articulate their goals for student learning and the level of expertise they've gained as teachers is why they stood out in a national field of candidates."

Baran says she will spend her fellowship year working on several technology-based instructional initiatives she began developing last year. These include designing several interactive modules that will allow her audiology students to handle case studies at their own pace, receive immediate feedback on their test assessments and procedures and have the ability to review case histories to assure mastery of the subject matter.

Royster says she will continue to focus her efforts on studying different learning styles and how teachers can use different types of assignments to reach all students. She says she currently give students some assignments involving visual media and journals, and some involving experience and service learning, along with more traditional essays and exams. Royster says she plans to study one of her classes in depth to find out how effective this method is in matching each student's preferred learning style.

Baran earned her bachelor's and master's degrees in communication disorders from UMass, and earned a doctorate in audiology and speech sciences from Purdue University. She joined the University in 1979.

Royster earned her bachelor's degree in sociology and psychology from Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, and a masters and doctorate from Johns Hopkins University. She joined the UMass faculty in 1993.

Baran and Royster will attend a conference for the national scholars in San Jose, California, near the Carnegie Foundation offices in Menlo Park June 12-25. CASTL is a major initiative of The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

Celebrated brew's return fuels debate

By Richard O'Mara

PRAGUE, Czech Republic — Human beings have invented or discovered an abundance of substances that offer short-term pleasure, often in exchange for long-term grief – things such as alcohol, cocaine, heroin. Few have yielded such a spate of grief as absinthe, the drink favored by bohemians a century ago in Paris and other cosmopolitan locales in Europe and the United States.

Absinthe drove men mad. Degas portrayed its stupefying effect artfully in his painting "L'Absinthe." Picasso and Manet worked the same theme. Some believed this drink, formulated in the 18th century by Henri Louis Pernod, stimulated artistic creativity.

Talky Oscar Wilde prattled on about visions. Baudelaire drank it for inspiration. So did Toulouse-Lautrec, Gauguin, Van Gogh. Others regard tales of its inspirational qualities as pish posh.

Looking back, the pish-posh school of thought seems to hold more credit, if only because of the millions upon millions of others who drank absinthe during its heyday and went on to create absolutely nothing.

The French had been making and selling absinthe for nearly a century before they banned it in 1915, by which time they were consuming 10 million gallons a year.

Other countries had moved more quickly: Belgium banned the drink in 1905, Switzerland in 1910. A little later, the United States went along. This followed years of physicians' observations of absinthe's long-range effects, including convulsions, hallucinations, insanity and other reactions. Thus, its prohibition was understandable.

Nonetheless, absinthe has returned. It is made here in the Czech Republic. Production started after the communists were thrown out.

After absinthe's earlier prohibition, substitutes emerged: Pernod, anisette, ouzo. Newsweek reports that there's one on the market in the United States, called Absente. All taste similar to absinthe but lack the stuff that made the original so dangerous: thujone.

Thujone, contained in wormwood (artemisia), upon which the drink is based, was absinthe's sinister secret.

The current Czech product, according to Daniel Hill, a member of the family that produces absinthe in the town of Jindrichuv Hradec, in southern Bohemia, has a "negligible" amount of

Tell-Tale Heart solves mystery in France

By John-Thor Dahlburg
Los Angeles Times

PARIS – On June 8, 1795, as France was in the throes of revolution, a 10-year-old boy succumbed to tuberculosis in the drafty tower of the Temple prison and one of the great mysteries of French history began.

Was this unfortunate child the Dauphin, sole surviving son of King Louis XVI and Queen Marie Antoinette, both of whom had been executed by republicans on the guillotine? Or was he a stand-in, with the heir to the throne of France having been spirited away to safety?

On Wednesday, modern DNA analysis in laboratories in Belgium and Germany provided what should be the decisive answer to this enigma: The unfortunate little prisoner, the researchers concurred, was in fact the Dauphin. For before the boy was buried in a common grave in eastern Paris two days after his death, the surgeon who performed the autopsy removed and kept the heart, wrapping it in a handkerchief and carrying it away in his pocket.

More than two centuries later, tissue from that withered organ has solved the riddle, in what Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie, the dean of French historians, called a "magnificent conquest" for both science and history.

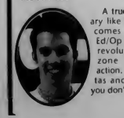
For 29 months, after his father, Louis XVI, was beheaded on the present-day Place de la Concorde, young Louis Charles of France was recognized by his mother and such European powers as Britain, Russia, Austria and Prussia as Louis XVII, rightful ruler of France. And throughout the 19th century, no fewer than 43 people surfaced who claimed to be the Dauphin.

The pretenders included a stable boy, a convicted murderer, a mason, a field marshal and an American colonel. In Mark Twain's 1884 novel, "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn," one of the most colorful characters, an itinerant con artist, also says he is the Dauphin, son of "Louis the Sixteen" and "Marry Antonette."

The most persuasive claimant of all, Berlin clockmaker Karl Wilhelm Naundorff, died in 1845 in the Netherlands and was even given an official death certificate by the Dutch identifying him as Louis XVII.

If the victim in the tower was indeed the Dauphin, it was a somber page in the annals of the fledgling French republic. "I am not against the Revolution, but these people were exterminating a clan, and that's very shocking," Le Roy Ladurie said in an interview.

But the belief that the boy was an impostor allowed France's small but devoted contingent of royalists to hope that a direct living link with the main branch of the Bourbons still remained.



The doctor who performed the autopsy, Philippe-Jean Pelletan, placed the dead child's heart in a crystal vase have never been given funding for airline tickets and hotel accommodations," Rossettie said.

Senator Michael Redmond argued against Rossettie's allegations, stating that the Finance Reserve is "emergency funding" and that the Ways and Means Committee has never funded for RSO travel accommodations. Hamill said that this is one of the biggest motions ever brought before the SGA Senate and that it would provide students with more power.

"If we strengthen the ties between students and legislation statewide, then we're going to have more power on this campus," Hamill stated. "RSO's shouldn't have to use their own funds to enforce the communication between SGA and students."

The motion passed.

Two motions were also passed in regards to student parking. In attempts to solve parking congestion in downtown Amherst, the town has brought forth an article to petition the UMass Board of Trustees to disallow first-year students the privilege of bringing vehicles to campus.

Senator Aaron Saunders said the purpose of the motion is to send a message to the town before the meeting to inform the town board that petitioning through the representatives on the Board of Trustees is unacceptable to the students' interests.

Sayani went against the motion, stating that he doesn't want to petition against Amherst before a decision has been made.

"I want to know, besides picking up an agenda, whether someone did research on this or talked to Michael Brennan at Parking Services," Sayani stated.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian spoke out against Sayani, arguing that the town shouldn't be limiting students' rights.

"If you vote against this, I want you to go to every freshman and explain to them why they can't have a car on campus," Avakian said. "I think it's absolutely ridiculous that we are considering limiting freshman access to parking."

The second parking motion that was passed was proposed by Sayani in an attempt to eliminate the temporary purple parking lot in Orchard Hill by July 1. Sayani said it was created as a "temporary solution" for the parking overflow last semester. According to him, the purpose of the motion is "to hold Parking Services accountable."

Many senators applauded President Jeff Howe for a memo he wrote proposing a resolution to the controversial appointed senate seats. The solution he stated is to eliminate the appointed seats over a two-year period, while creating an Executive Cabinet position and Standing Committee to address the need for more diverse student representation in a democratic body.

The senate passed two other motions before the senators lost quorum and were forced to "special order" the remaining motions for next week's meeting.

thujone. "It wouldn't be absinthe without it," he says.

The best news, says diplomat Marcel Sauer at the Czech Embassy in Washington, is this: "You don't go mad anymore."

Daniel Hill and his uncle, Vladimir Hill, operate out of Canada, where they distribute Hill's Absinth – spelled without the final "e" – to any country that will buy it. Those countries include Germany, Austria, Russia and Great Britain.

Britain never did ban absinthe, maybe because it was never as popular there as it was on the Continent. The Brits had their own substances to worry about, such as laudanum, an opium derivative all the rage during Victorian times.

Absinthe is still legal, which may be why London has become the locus of absinthe's revival. The stuff they're drinking these days in fashionable SoHo bars and clubs comes from Hill's distillery.

"We're trying to get approval for it in Canada," Daniel Hill said. "I think there's a chance."

The Hills have very little expectation that absinthe will ever be sold in the United States, where thujone is banned.

Canadian preacher launches oil crusade

By Steven Pearlstein
Washington Post

TORONTO – Weibo Ludwig, the controversial preacher who launched a crusade against the oil and gas industry from his remote Alberta commune, was convicted Wednesday of vandalizing two gas wells and illegally conspiring to obtain explosives.

But in a lengthy opinion delivered from the Court of Queens Bench in Edmonton, Justice Sterling Sanderman cleared Ludwig, 58, of more serious charges of extortion and endangering human life.

Co-defendant Richard Boonstra, another resident of the commune whose three daughters are married to Ludwig's three sons, was also convicted of participating in the attacks.

After the verdict was read out, a stone-faced Ludwig was ordered held without bail pending his sentencing next week.

The key charge against the two men involves the explosion at a Suncor Oil Co. well near Hinton, Alberta. In the hours before the blast, police – who for months had been tailing Ludwig by car and plane – observed his van drive back and forth four times on the highway near the well. The next morning, police separately apprehended Ludwig and Boonstra walking in the woods several miles away. Police experts testified that Ludwig had traces of explosives on his hand.

That explosion occurred days after the stillbirth of a child at the Trickle Creek Farm – the sort of health problem that Ludwig has charged resulted from the gas flares used by the industry to vent their wells.

Although Sanderman acknowledged that much of the evidence against Ludwig was circumstantial, he said it was "powerfully circumstantial."

The judge rejected a motion by Ludwig's attorney to set aside his verdict because of police misconduct. Evidence presented at the trial revealed that local energy companies, anxious to thwart a rash of oil patch vandalism, had funneled money and manpower to the police to help accelerate the investigation. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police also acknowledged it had staged an explosion at an abandoned gas well to boost the credibility of an informant who was seeking to infiltrate Ludwig's commune.

Sanderman called the police tactics "regrettable but understandable," considering the considerable cunning used to thwart and frustrate the two-year police investigation.

Ludwig, a media-savvy former preacher with a quick wit and unshakable convictions, had become a hero to environmentalists and others in oil-rich Alberta who live near gas wells. His campaign has resulted in tougher environmental regulation of gas wells in the province.

But residents of towns near Trickle Creek came to fear Ludwig and his brand of "eco-terrorism" increasingly since last fall, when a local teenager, Carmen Willis, was shot to death when she and some friends drove their truck onto the front lawn at Trickle Creek during a midnight joy ride. While refusing to say who fired the shot, Ludwig said the truck nearly ran over some of his grandchildren, who were sleeping out in tents. No charges have been filed.

"We're extremely satisfied with the verdicts," said Brian Peterson, president of West County Concerned Citizens, which sent a busload of its members into Edmonton to hear the verdict. "This is a dangerous man. We're happy that he'll now be going to prison."

filled with ethyl alcohol, and it stayed for 15 years on his shelf. It was stolen by one of his students, then returned, and finally given to the archdiocese of Paris for safekeeping.

In 1830, as yet another republican revolution shook Paris, the building where the heart was kept was burned down. Pelletan's son, also a physician, later found the shards of the crystal vase, and the heart, buried under a pile of sand.

The organ, now as desiccated and hard as a piece of wood, has been preserved in a crystal urn in the crypt of the basilica of Saint-Denis north of Paris, resting place of the kings and queens of France, since 1975. In December, two small tissue samples were compared with DNA extracted from the locks of hair preserved from the Dauphin's mother, Marie Antoinette, two of the ill-fated queen's sisters, and contemporary descendants of the Hapsburg dynasty, to which the Austrian-born Marie Antoinette belonged.

On Wednesday, the researchers who performed the DNA tests, Jean-Jacques Cassiman of the University of Louvain's center for human genetics in Belgium and Ernst Brinckmann of the University of Munster in Germany, issued their findings.

In the heart tissue, "the two scientists found more DNA than they thought," reported historian Philippe Delorme, who had the idea for the analysis. He said the DNA tests also turned up positive with two living Hapsburgs.

The Dauphin, in fact, may have been sired by Marie Antoinette's Swedish lover, the Count Axel von Fersen, Louis XVI being notorious for his lack of virility.

He was born March 27, 1785, with the title of duke of Normandy, and became Dauphin, or heir to the throne of France, upon the natural death in 1789 of his older brother, Louis Joseph, duke of Burgundy.

On Jan. 21, 1793, 3 1/2 years after revolutionaries stormed of the Bastille prison in Paris, Louis XVI was guillotined. For five months, the royal family had been imprisoned in the Temple, the former Paris quarters of the Knights Templar. Upon his father's death, the Dauphin was 8.

In a decision now as difficult to interpret as anything other than needlessly cruel, the Committee of Public Safety, the main instrument of anti-royalist terror, ordered that the Dauphin should taken away from Marie Antoinette and kept isolated in a well-guarded tower of the Temple. Historians say there were several rival plans to get the boy out – by monarchists who dreamed of a restoration, but also by republicans who wanted him as a hostage.

The official cause of death was ruled as tuberculosis, but there are widespread suspicions that at the very least, his captors let him die to extinguish the royal bloodline. The death certificate was made out to "Louis Charles Capet, son of Louis Capet, last king of the French."

Our Opinion
Preserve Miranda

The required reading of the Miranda rights has been a part of the judicial culture of the United States since the 1966 Supreme Court case of Miranda v. Arizona. Famous throughout the world, a staple of arrests and cop shows everywhere, it is one of the hallmarks of the American judicial system, and it may not last the week.

"You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law. You have the right to speak to an attorney, and to have an attorney present during any questioning. If you cannot afford a lawyer, one will be provided for you at government expense."

That is the Miranda warning, in place to ensure that those arrested under suspicion of a crime will know their rights against self-incrimination and interrogation without council. This is the text that is in danger of being eliminated from American society.

Ernesto Miranda was arrested in 1963 on charges of kidnapping and rape. He signed a confession that was used in his trial, and was convicted and shipped off to jail with a 20-year sentence.

Miranda never knew that he had the right to remain silent. He was never told that he was not required to incriminate himself. Miranda was never provided with a lawyer; he did not know that he had the ability to request one to assist him in his defense.

And so he appealed to the Supreme Court and won, and his trial was overturned. He was retried again without his confession and again convicted, and this time went to jail for the long run.

Ernesto Miranda was a criminal. This did not mean that he did not have certain rights to protect himself, rights that he was not aware could be used in his defense. Everyone in this society has equal access to rights, even kidnappers and rapists. This meant that his first conviction was unjust.

However, just because one has rights does not mean that one is not a criminal, and so justice was served on Miranda and he paid his debt to society. He was convicted in a fair trial without any illegal evidence and without any violation of his rights... the way it should always be.

The Miranda rights have been read to countless suspects since then, helping countless people know their rights and exercise them. The effect of this reading is debatable: no one can know exactly how many people were helped in their defense and ensured a fair trial by Miranda. One can know, however, that it must have helped some, because the case of Ernesto Miranda can hardly have been unique.

We here at the Daily Collegian believe that the Supreme Court should uphold the Miranda law. Even if it aids only one person in getting the fair trial that one should simply take for granted in this country than it is doing a job that is beyond the highest value. It should not be overturned.

Making sacrifices for the social lives of friends: a true story

I've never needed to be the center of attention. The idea of wanting everybody to look at me and pay attention to the little things I do sounds selfish and is a waste of time. You know those people – the ones who talk at a higher decibel than necessary, the ones who look perfect on every occasion and get upset if not all eyes are on them?

Luckily for me, I don't really attract much attention. I don't look exotic or feel the need to wear skimpy tank tops uptown in the dead of winter. Not that I look good in one anyway, but you get the point. I'm actually on the quiet side in groups and the idea of being alone usually sounds good. I've learned that it's good to surround yourself with people who aren't as quiet as me, but who will soak up any attention that comes our way and handle it well.

Needless to say, the bar scene can get a little annoying at times, with three-quarters of the people just trying to get somebody else to look at them and 99.9-percent trying to get wasted so they can forget about the fact that their master plan of attraction failed at the end of the night.

Also in my favor is that I have a boyfriend, and I no longer care if anybody looks at me. However, there is still that role you to play as the "Nice and Fun Friend" if a guy comes to talk to one of your friends. You want it to appear as if overall, you're a great bunch and your friend who is being hit on surrounds herself with exciting people, and that clearly she's worth the attention. The situation can totally be reversed if your friend is of the opposite sex to give them at least the opportunity to look single.

In any case, I'm more than happy to play that role on most occasions, but sometimes, I just lose my interest and don't care. This is what happened this weekend during my celebration of Marathon Monday.

I went out with my friend Alison and two of her friends, Elissa and Stephania, in Boston on Sunday night and Monday. I don't drink, so the point for me was just to have a good time and hang out with my friend. But there are some people who always attract attention just by the way they look no matter where they are, and Alison is one of them.

Kathleen Ralls

On Sunday night, we went to Clarke's in Faneuil Hall. We had a good time for the half hour we were there until we decided to head to another bar. Now, Stephania is one of those girls who strives for this attention. She looked like she walked out of a J Crew catalog and was always smiling in case anybody was watching. If they weren't watching, she would go over and make sure they sat up and took notice.

While we were walking to the next bar in Government Center, we passed another one and Stephania yelled out to the building, "I slept with a guy from there last weekend, hope he likes his STD." She said it in a joking manner so we would assume that she didn't have any diseases, but she wasn't kidding about sleeping with him. What kind of person needs to scream that in a public place while hanging out with people like me whom she had never met less than an hour ago? She must have had some Fun Friends to help her land that one.

When we got to the new bar, Stephania ditched us to hit on some bartender upstairs while we hung out in the downstairs part. It didn't take long before this tall guy came over to talk to Alison. He wasn't bad looking and about six-foot-five, which was a treat for Alison, who is almost six feet tall. After some introduction, Ted, as he called himself, spent the rest of the night talking to Alison. He made all the moves, dropped all the lines, talked close and got her phone number at the end of the night.

Since our friends were upstairs, I was left with just these two and at first, I tried to play the Funny Friend. I laughed at a couple of his jokes and cracked a couple myself. Since I had no other options as far as talking to anybody at the time, I was hoping that he was just being friendly, but that obviously wasn't his intention. I got bored playing Fun Friend Kathleen so I inched away and lip-read the last 20 minutes of SportsCenter. As it ended up, Alison didn't need a Fun Friend that night, and I though I would rest well knowing that I knew my place and played my role. I was wrong, though.

At the end of the night, Ted wanted us to meet his Fun Friends, so we turned around to meet a pair of five-foot-six guys with black, shiny buckled shoes who laughed at our youth (they were pushing 30). After smirking at the smooth moves of their friend Ted, they looked at us and said, "Beat it" to which I replied an equally rude comment and a dirty look. My patience had worn pretty thin and apparently, theirs had too.

The next day didn't get much better. We had moved onto a new bar and Alison left to wait in the bathroom line. Trying to watch the winners plow through to the finish line, this guy leaned over his booth and tapped me on the shoulder.

"I saw your friend with the blue shirt on and I tried to talk to her but she didn't seem that friendly," he said. Being the Fun Friend, I reasoned with him that waiting in line for the bathroom isn't that much fun but that she is definitely a nice person. When Alison returned, her admirer, John, came over and started talking to her and she responded. This time, however, I had been standing in a bar for four hours and I didn't care by then. My feet ached and this guy thought it was hilarious to call me "Becky." I can't explain why.

Finally, after 20 minutes of withstanding the flirting, I asked John if his friends, who had extra room in their booth, were nice. He affirmed my wish and I sat down. After getting over the "You don't drink at all, is that for religious reasons or something" hump, we had a good time on minimal effort. John's friends, who were fun in the beginning, had reached the same point I had, and didn't want to bother trying to be friendly either.

I think we've all been in this situation, where you try for your friend until you just don't care. I like to reason that friends really don't need our help by a certain point in the conversation, and hey, you don't want to steal any of their much-needed attention away, do you?

A wonderful new world of delicious calzonication

I was lucky when I was a freshman. I came here weighing about 150 pounds and I left at the end of the year having only gained six or seven more. That's not to say I didn't drink a ton or eat my fair share of greasy late night food. I was just lucky enough to have a well-oiled metabolism. Now let's get back to the greasy food. When I was filling out my applications for college and eventually getting ready to come to splendid UMass, I had no idea of the amount of blue cheese, spicy chicken and calzones that awaited my digestive system.

I am quite content with the variety of food available to me and ms acquaintances in the wee hours of the night when our drunken instincts decide it's time to feed. However, I do feel that Pinocchio's and DP Dough need to add some calzones to their arsenal. I have eaten enough Blue Zones and Devil Zones to feed a small drunken army. So with one of my final columns I will give the local restaurants that serve calzones some ideas for future calzone expansion.

The first calzone I highly recommend the creation of is the Placenta Zone. This is for all of the vegans and vegetarians around the Amherst area. You see the only part of the animal that vegans and vegetarians are allowed to eat is the placenta. The reason for this is that the placenta is discarded from the pregnant animal after it gives birth. Since the placenta is discarded from the animal it is not necessary for the animal to survive and it is O.K. to eat it. I think along with the placenta the calzone should have blue cheese, spinach and olives. This'll be a big hit up in Central and in Bickhertown.

The next calzone that I am looking forward to eating is the Jack-Ass Zone. This would consist of Monterey Jack cheese and donkey meat. This will be a favorite food of Mexicans and people from the southwest of the US because they're used to riding donkeys instead of cars and eating them when they break down.

Another calzone that I'm sure will be a fan favorite is the Winnie The Pooh Zone. This calzone would have marijuana, honey and blue cheese in it. The blue cheese is something every calzone can benefit from. The honey is there because that's what Winnie The Pooh always eats, while the weed is necessary because Winnie The Pooh is so damned stupid and lazy. Kids will love this one.

The fourth calzone that should be in development is the Placebo Zone. This calzone would have nothing in it. The only time anyone will be able to order this is when someone else in the same house ordered a calzone with a ton of stuff in it. Then after the two people eat their calzones they will have to guess which calzone was which. This will be a big hit among the premed students.

Another favorite of the students in the years to come will be the Murphy Brown Zone. The first ingredient would be potatoes. This is because of the huge disagreement she had with Dan Quayle over how to spell potato. The next ingredient in the Murphy Brown zone would be estrogen. This is because the only people who regularly watched Murphy Brown were women. This calzone will sell like hot cakes at Smith and Mount Holyoke.

Another calzone to come will be the Circus Zone. The main ingredient will be facial hair from a bearded lady. When sautéed in margarine clippings from the beard of a woman have an aphrodisiac effect. Also in this calzone would be candle wax, whipped cream, shrimp and cocktail sauce. This calzone would be a romantic evening all in one bite. The Circus Zone is perfect for the man who can't afford a full scale evening out, but still wants to get some from a respectable girl.

Dan Viens

A calzone that may have a hard time catching on, but I feel has the potential to be the hidden gem of the late night food industry, is the Alien Cow Zone. As many of you may or may not know aliens have been blamed for the inversion of hundreds of thousands of cows over the course of time. No one can really explain these events. All anyone is absolutely sure of is that thousands of cows have been turned inside out. In honor of these brave cows the Alien Cow Zone will be inside out. In the middle of each box will be a cooked piece of dough and throughout the box will be the ingredients of the customer's choice.

Oh, I don't know, maybe these calzones are foolish. Maybe it is just a pipe dream to think that one man can have a profound effect on an established industry. However, as I inch closer and closer to graduation I realize how important it is to follow one's dreams. I've come to understand that without dreamers the world as we know it may cease to exist. Granted that I'm not starting a revolution or creating a new wonder drug, but so help me Gob if one couple gets together because of the Circus Zone I feel like I will have a job well done on my hands. In order to make this dream become a reality it may take some blood, sweat and tears. However, that's nothing compared to letting one's dreams fall through the cracks.

Hard work not elitist

Maybe I'm going to talk about being hard-working today; maybe I'll talk about attitude, but I'm going to talk about my mentors from high school, Josh and Three. That much I'm sure of.

I was at Chili's the other night with a group of people. My friends Lisa, Ryan, Mike, Kurt and Jason were all there, along with one girl from the Commonwealth College whose name escapes me. We were talking about that particular institution, and I was trying to explain my opposition to it, albeit not as powerfully as Jason, who seemed to be getting quite irritated with her position on the matter.

She maintained that she had to work harder than most students, and then relegated our quite valid statements about the school to jealousy that we couldn't be in her position. We tried to disregard her arrogance, which was pretty hard to do because It's quite obnoxious to tell people with valid issues that they're nothing but jealous of those being complained about. To a certain extent, it's like a white person telling a black person that they're jealous they aren't white, as if that has anything to do with the situation.

Sam Wilkinson

I took issue with her statement of being hardworking more than anything, because, while that too was an inane and arrogant statement to make, it was insulting.

Downright insulting because cry and moan as she might, she isn't harder working. She might be as hard-working, but she certainly isn't more so. It's insulting to every student who has a job on this campus to make life's money, it's insulting to everybody who works real hard in non-honors classes to get their 4.0, it's insulting to anybody outside the Commonwealth College who ever really put themselves on the line ahead of an institution.

However, on that night, I wasn't thinking in any sort of grand academic way; I was thinking about myself, and it was insulting to me. With her broad sweep, she insulted all of my friends at the Collegian, every Lisa Metcalf and Jason Trenkle, every Adam White, as well as every friend throughout our great world that has to work and study, and it also insulted me. We all work harder than she could probably imagine, regardless of what her friends and parents tell her.

She's pursuing a degree, a job, something, anything, a Holy Grail sometime in the next three or four years. But the people I know, we're chasing the next day's Collegian, A front page of news, photographs and headlines. Or maybe it's simply the paycheck to pay rent once more, buy cereal for dinner, whatever.

Every day. It isn't even a chip on our shoulder at this point; rather, we're just chips off the block. And we've become the people I first met when I started in all of this.

"And while it's a small world, it's a juicy son of a bitch and it tastes like spring."
-Josh Greene, Mentor

Tracked down my friend Josh Greene the other day. Or maybe I just emailed him; don't really know how to differentiate between the two these days, but whatever. We got in contact.

When I was 15 and 16, he kept an eye on me when I was first grinding it out at a newspaper. When I got stuck, he kicked my butt off in the right direction, when I got frustrated, he told me to keep it up, when I got mad, he told me that whatever was making me angry wouldn't be worth it tomorrow.

He was probably what most people would define as an unsavory sort: he liked to shoot guns, liked to read Hunter S. Thompson, liked to take drugs. Hung out in strip clubs and once told me that if I was really short of cash, stick up a nudie bar, but bring guns 'cause they always had a lot behind the counter and nobody would ever call the cops. He had a file at the Social Justice office of complaints; he was a racist, a bigot, a homophobe and a sexist. None of that was true, but people liked to complain. I've never seen a person treat others better, regardless of who they were.

Shook his hand on a summer day when I was 17, haven't seen him since. Left town, headed to here and there, back again, and then to Oregon, which is where I'm pretty sure he's emailing me from these days. He might have moved on; where he is really isn't that important. Neither are the drugs, the writing or the guns.

How he influenced me, kept an eye on me, made sure I was working that much harder: those are the things that are important. He was the best kind of mentor, the kind that was there doing his thing, letting a kid look up to him and instead of molding me in his own image, simply offering me some of his best ones.

I met the guy through a mentorship program, the same program where I met the other guy that kept an eye on me: Three Wells.

"Good luck, and you can sleep when you're dead."
-Three Wells

He wasn't crazy like Josh. Wasn't as harsh. But a hard worker, dedicated and committed. He knew the dirt that hid under the dirt that the locals kept under their fingernails. He did his research, he wrote his daily editorial, and he did it everyday.

Couldn't deny the man his work ethic if you wanted to; might have had a crazy mane of hair, Josh might have had a gun in his boot, but both of them worked as hard as anybody else I ever came across. I mention them only because their outlooks and traits, and especially that hard work, influenced me, made me into the person I am today.

Our grades are suffering at work; invitations to the Commonwealth College are probably not forthcoming, and that girl at Chili's will probably never find the intelligence it takes to realize that studying for a few hours a day doesn't make her a "harder" worker as compared to those.

As for Jason and Adam and Lisa, I don't know where they got theirs, I don't even know if they'd be insulted by what the girl at Chili's said. Maybe they wouldn't have been, and that makes them better people than me. I couldn't stand it, still can't.

Because we make our choices and stick by them, and unlike that girl at Commonwealth College, we choose to work and we do it, no complaints. None of us complain about the amount of work we do, none of us play the victim because none of us are. We're just hard workers.

Spring On Campus

After long months of taking shelter from the bitter New England winter, the time has come to reacquaint ourselves with the splendor of the outside world. The Pioneer Valley region of Massachusetts offers a wealth of recreational opportunities, from quick afternoon hikes to weekends spent camping under the stars, far from any road or more importantly, any lecture hall. This week, the Collegian is taking a look at some of the ways you can enjoy the warmer weather and longer days.

Hiking Trails

Taking off on foot requires a minimum of preparation: pack yourself some trail mix, plenty of water, maybe some bug juice and sunscreen depending upon the weather and season, and you're good to go. And where, exactly, are you going? Mt. Holyoke and the Holyoke Range is a great place to start. It's the ridge of small mountains you can see to south of the UMass campus, and it offers 10 miles of the Metacomet and Monadnock trails. Skinner State Park along route 41 in Hadley supplies parking. Nothing but Cheers and White Pepper in Today's Trax

WEEN
White Pepper
Elektra

As is their way, Ween is completely unpredictable – musically, conceptually, just about every way imaginable. And this tradition is proudly continued on their seventh release, White Pepper. This album follows 1997's pseudo-concept album The Mollusk and is close to a year after the release of last year's Paintin' The Town Brown: Ween Live '90-'98. The brainchild of Mickey Melchiondo and Aaron Freeman, a.k.a. Gene and Dean Ween, the group dates back to the 1990 debut GodWeenSatan: The Oneness, and has enjoyed a decade of critical worship and MTV snubbery. The duo have amassed a dedicated fan base, and deservedly so with their legendarily creative and spontaneous live shows where Dean and Gene are in full band mode with drummers and bassists to back their vocals and guitars. However, the press release for White Pepper is quick to point out that fans should be aware of certain changes that take place on the album. Among these developments are the unexplained absence of the word "fuck" (this is also the first Ween release to be recorded in full band mode, akin to their live show.

Some things, however, never change, and Ween's characteristic humor and variety of styles are all fully on display. The nice thing about Ween is that while other bands mix styles and aren't really good at any of them, Ween masters all of them, and give them all their proper due. "Exactly Where I'm At" and "Hutes Of Chi" are both mid-tempo numbers which recall both the easygoing charm of the Stone Roses, as well as the Beatles circa Revolver. The exciting variety of White Pepper is best showcased in the progression of the next few tracks. "Even if you Don't" is a cheesy love song pulled straight out of the 80's complete with corny synth loop in the background, and is followed by a hilarious Jimmy Buffet send-up brilliantly titled "Bananas and Blow," steel drums included. "Stroker Ace," a relentless, Motorhead-like punk/metal blast then follows, which ends abruptly to make way for the serene instrumental "Ice Castles." And throughout, all of the tracks are flawless in their execution, never overdone, and always listenable. I'm not sure what the grand plan is behind the striking variety of White Pepper, but regardless, it's a hell of a lot of fun trying to discover it. A- (Michael Delano)

CHAINFALL
Sicken Me Digi-Core #1 Remixes
Altered Industry Entertainment

The first release of any band is bound to be a big deal; a statement is going to want to be made, a message sent. For Chainfall, a local band based out of Shutesbury MA, the "Sicken Me" remix single is that first definitive statement. Does it succeed?

The single (available only from mp3.com or the band's official website, www.chainfall.com) is composed of six different versions of Sicken Me. There's the original version, a radio edit version (which is actually only a few seconds shorter than the original), and four different techno remix versions. That's a whole lot of "Sicken Me" for one CD, but it actually works.

Chainfall is composed of vocalist Lenore Renee, guitarist/vocalist Benjamin Ion, bassist/vocalist Tristan Tash, and a DJ by the name of Lucid. Their sound, with all three vocalists having very different vocal styles (Somewhat classical for Renore, a calm nuetrals for Tash, and a full on black metal howl for Ion) rapidly trading off verses over very heavy music and drum/electronic samples (courtesy of Lucid), is very fresh and different. Now, "different" has been applied to numerous bands for numerous reasons, but Chainfall, as represented by this one song and others available online, are different in a good way. I have no idea what "digi-core" means, but this music is quality.

"Sicken Me" is a really great song, hooks and catchy, making full use of all the band members' talents. The radio edit is also good, with a little bit edited out and some minor beneficial changes, making it the highlight of the single. The first remix by Diesel/Mindrot is the best, keeping most of the song intact while speeding it up and embellishing the drum track and the electronic boops and beeps in an enjoyable fashion. The Zero Hour remix by Lucid himself is less good, but still listenable, with some cool electronic stuff going on, even if it is a tad bit long. The Infinity Club Remix, however, is something that should not have been. A remix which nearly triples the length of the original song (clocking in at over eleven minutes), where you can go for interminable periods with no vocals, guitars, or even anything remotely resembling the original "Sicken Me," and seemingly endless electronica drum-bass noodling, this is simply a boring exercise which could have easily been left off.

Does the "Sicken Me" single succeed in sending off that first fateful shot? Certainly. What more can you ask from a single than a great title song and some good extras? If Chainfall had trimmed some of the fat off the b-sides, this could have been flawless, but as it is they still earn their grade of A- (Rob Schultz)

DIARY OF DREAMS
One of 18 Angels
Metropolis

CROCODILE SHOP
Order+Joy
Metropolis

No doubt emerging as soon as the next big trend after this boy band thing dies down will be the German Goth/darkwave/industrial scene. Alright, maybe not, but being light-years out of the current US pop mentality doesn't prevent smaller international scenes from substantiating their genres with quantity and quality. And this particular style isn't completels foreign to Western audiences. Rammstein gave us a little taste a couple of years back with the hit "Du Hast," and Trent Reznor and NIN, although not German, definitely have the gloomy, atmospheric sound of this movement ingrained in theirs. But if history has taught us anything, it's that American listeners have the attention span of a four year old, so Rammstein has receded into the background and NIN is releasing the very anti-old NIN "We're In This Together," a short time and then move on.

Tax On Trax Off

The majority of listeners like things for

Geany's Diary of Dreams doesn't give you anything for a short time. All of the album's eleven tracks are over five minutes long, giving the group plenty of time to flesh out their unique sound, but also allows for a seriously long (almost 70 minutes) and dark journey. DOD is Adrian Hates, Olaf Schaning, Alistair Kane, and Christian Berghoff. The foursome has released a number of albums overseas, including "Bird Without Wings" and "Psychoma," the latter being the first to feature all four members in the studio. Signing to Metropolis in 1999, the band released a compilation of sorts, and now their proper debut One of 18 Angels. The lush sound of the album is created by applying a more rounded feel to their strong industrial backbone, as well as employing piano and string arrangements almost constantly throughout the album. Some of the compositions sound almost orchestral in their complexity, although for much of the album the driving industrial sounds are the thrust of the songs. Hate's voice recalls a mix of Peter Steele, Duran Duran, and Depeche Mode, and the gloomy lyrics help keep the music grounded in a hypnotic drone/groove.

Berlin's Crocodile Shop picks the pace up a bit. Their dark outlook on the state of affairs is similar to DOD's, but they at least inspire you to tap your feet while you express your hate and disgust for the world. Croc Shop also dates back to the early nineties, and has released nearly ten albums and remix albums, including four for Metropolis. Members Mick Hale on vocals and keyboards and programmers V. Markus and Len9 integrate a very prominent electronic element to their music, which creates a chaotic sound when layered against the booming industrial components. The frenetic pace of "Blinding" and "New Ideal" at their quirky and aggressive best.

You might need some Britney or BSB after wallowing in the depths of despair that Diary of Dreams and Crocodile Shop dwell in, but for a murky and depressing ride, these two should provide adequate bleakness. Diary of Dreams: C+ Crocodile Shop: B- (Michael Delano)

CHEERLEADR
Rock Album
Pep Rally Records

Cheerleadr may be the best new band that you have never heard of. After some serious awards under their belt, they are truly ready to hit the big time. Directly off of their nomination for a Kahlua Boston Music Award for Outstanding Club Band, Cheerleadr presents their third release, Rock Album. The previous two albums, Cream of Cheerleadr and Batten Down the Hatches, were welcomed on radio stations and in magazines throughout the world, especially on college campuses.

Cheerleadr has already developed quite a large following in New England. They played venues in Worcester, Portland and Providence that proved to be packed. Because of some tremendous publicity from the Boston Globe and The Boston Herald, people have begun to discover Cheerleadr. Besides just discovering them, people have started to rely on Cheerleadr to deliver the goods, and that is exactly what the new album does.
